Mr. Neff was one of the founders of the National League and of the Ohio State League, and he labors day and night for the advancement of these now powerful organizations. He spends a large part of his time traveling in various States and perfecting organizations of State leagues. His slogan is: "Raising of the Standard of the Motion Picture Business and the Elimination of Immoral Pictures."

A mighty good standard, don't you think?

The creation of a National Board of Censors by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America is now being advocated by President Neff. "The furtherance of the league's efforts to limit its shows to the planes of strictest morality would be greatly enhanced through the operations of the league in conjunction with governmental censors," asserts Mr. Neff.

In emphasizing the necessity of such procedure in the campaign he is waging against immorality, he cited to the "Moving Picture News" representative, numerous examples where the standard of moving picture theatres was endangered by films of low grade.

"Such films," said President Neff, "have a tendency to lower the standard not only of theatres in which they are shown, but of the cinematograph industry in general. If we care to pursue our aim with the determination that was evident at the outset, we will take such measures as have been suggested to curb the promiscuous display of that upon which we frown."

Mr. Neff says the exhibitor needs protection from the "Film Trust," the large theatre which shows pictures on Sunday, and the "milker" in the city councils and legislatures. He says the large theatres should not be permitted to show pictures on Sunday, "because they care little about the industry and do not attempt to uplift its standard."

"The interests of the public and exhibitors are similar," says Mr. Neff, "and it is the duty of the latter to see that the public is protected from fire in the theatre and from improper pictures."

It is a great work that President Neff, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, is doing. In his speeches and his correspondence he is constantly trying to promote the dignity of cinematography and the interests of the exhibitors. His latest work is to announce the next State meeting of the Ohio Exhibitors' League to be held at Dayton, March 26th and 27th. Senator Foraker and Congressman Cox (there go those political friends again), will speak, and Mr. Neff will respond. There is going to be a banquet and a good, instructive time generally. Mr. Neff says so. He knows.

The Exhibitors' League of America is fortunate in having the leadership of M. A. Neff, of Cincinnati. Honestly, he is one man in a thousand and is peculiarly fit for the diplomatic and difficult duties of president of such an influential body.

More power to President Neff and others of his ilk, is the devout wish of the "News." As for William Jennings Bryan and those little political hobbies—well, let them pass; let them pass—we all have our frills and foibles.

SIDE LIGHTS ON THE CINEMATOGRAPH

The Censor in England

By Leonard Donaldson

In my last article I referred to the present unsatisfactory state of the official dramatic censorship in England. There is something incomprehensible about the changes that occur in the opinions of those responsible for the censoring of plays for the "legitimate" stage. The production of "Oedipus Rex" (which, by the way, has been produced in film form at the Scala Theatre by Mr. Chas. Urban) was banned for years in the ordinary drama—it now receives a license. "Salomé" may be danced on the stage, but Oscar Wilde's play may not be performed. The passion of the "Ring of the Niebelungs" and other operas may be set to music, but Maeterlinck's "Monna Vanna" is not for London audiences. The office has been responsible for some strange anomalies: Some years ago "The Mikado," after playing for many years, was banned temporarily for fear it would give offense to the Japanese Prince then on a visit to England. Biblical characters may not be introduced, but the Virgin Mary and the Infant Saviour may be the center of a great spectacle such as "The Miracle," now appearing at Olympia. Although plays with the devil as a character have been permitted, the Nativity play "Bethlehem" is barred. Quite recently too, "Herodiade," the opera, was licensed, but the character of St. John the Baptist, in order to conform to the regulations, had to be renamed, "A Prophet."

Many of the plays for which the censor refused a license have been performed privately or published in book form, so that the critics have had an opportunity of testing the censor's judgment. Only in a few cases has it been upheld.

Now, however, that dramatic sketches for the "vaudeville" stage will need to be licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, the question of a censor for films is again under discussion, and it is the sincere desire of all who have in any way followed the inconsistent measures of the dramatic censors, that the same impossible state of things will not obtain in the film business.

It is contended by several prominent members of the trade in England that a similar censorship as exists in your country, Cousin America, could be instituted to advantage. I have been making inquiries on my side as to its necessity and desirability and am obtaining some really valuable information on the subject, which I will relate in my next article.

ECLAIR ENLARGES STOCK COMPANY

Several additions to the Eclair forces include William Dunn, late of the Vitagraph stock, and Muriel Ostrich, a dainty and pretty ingenue.

Mr. Arnaud's company embraces fourteen acting people, while Mr. Francis is supported by twelve members. Two more artists have been engaged to bring the latter company up to the former in size. These additions will be announced later.

Susan Willets is now in charge of the Eclair scenario bureau as editress. Mrs. Willets comes from the Vitagraph Company, where she filled a similar position.

WHY NOT ELIMINATE THE WEAK POINTS?

By Margaret I. MacDonald

Many an otherwise good production loses its proper allotment of "boost" by that lack of attention to detail which makes us so often settle back with a sigh. That grip of interest with which the picture has held us up to this point has loosened very noticeably with the sudden appearance of that "weak spot." In the scene of some hundred years ago the modern steamboat comes steaming up the river; at the door of the fashionable boarding school the newcomer is met in the most gushing manner by the usually dignified principal or head governess, who in real life remain in their solemn sanctums while the maid answers the door; the actor by accident has forgotten to turn his back but on the contrary faces full upon the deception that is supposed to be perpetrated behind his back. The name of the various kinds of peculiar and inconsistent incidents that occur almost daily to mar an otherwise splendid whole, is legion.

True it is that the director of a moving picture performance has very often exceedingly raw material to work with, and it may not always be his fault that such inconsistencies occur, but I feel sure that some of them, at least, he is responsible for.

At the door of the moving picture studio there is a never decreasing throng of would-be stockites and we agree that to make use of some of the applicants is like trying to fit a square peg into a round hole. Nevertheless a little more discrimination, a little more hard cash to come the actor's way, might in a large measure eliminate the distracting "weak spot." Substituting individuals with good common sense and dramatic ability for some of the stupidity that once in a while pops out on the screen would improve in a large measure some of the pretentious productions that aspiring manufacturers are striving to put on the market.

The incompetent director, the incompetent actor, and the insufficient payment to good talent and well written stories, are the greatest enemies of perfection in production that the moving picture has.

And still for all that I have resorted in a measure to the hammer at the present writing, I am nevertheless filled with enthusiasm that the moving picture as handled by our Independent brotherhood has progressed with such strides as seems, as we look backward a year or so, almost incredible. The high mark which they have set as their goal is suggested in the quality and character of pictures which they are placing weekly upon the market.

THE CHAP WHO SINGS

Let's sing of the lad
Who is only too glad
To tell us love stories o'er;
He can sing on the stage
And can earn a fair wage
By rehearsing the lovers' lore.
Now here is a chap
Who is smart as a trap
And can gab business all day long.
Hats off to the guy
With the silvery cry
Whose selections spell the great throng!

Solax, "His Musical Soul," made a great hit in a Quincy, Illinois, theatre the other evening. One woman laughed so heartily that she had to leave the theatre.

Proprietors of moving picture theatres in West Virginia held a convention at Parkersburg on February 28th and perfected a State organization. President M. A. Neff, of the National Moving Picture Association, was present. He says that over 16,000 theatres are affiliated with the association over which he so ably presides.

The Ohio State Inspector of Workshops and Factories in his annual report to the Governor, advocates the licensing of operators of moving picture machines. He also states the machines should be manually operated. It is believed that many picture theatres in smaller Ohio cities will be compelled to close down because of the activity of building inspectors in enforcing a prescribed standard of architecture.

LITTLE WILLIE'S RESCUE

Master Willie Johnson was a clever little chap,
For Pa and Ma's sage advice he didn't care a rap.
He was long on yellow literature
"Dare Devil Dick" hit it sure!
"Creepy Dan" and "Desperate Milly,"
Were favorites with Little Willie.

Master Willie's parents were against the novel bold,
Some of Willie's stories made their blood run cold.
They were partial to the picture show,
So Willie was induced to go.
Now "Creepy Dan" and "Desperate Milly,"
No longer worry Little Willie.

MOVING PICTURE SHOW'S HISTORY

When moving pictures first came out they were immediately called a "fad." It was predicted that the pictures would quite soon pass away. When someone "knocked" the picture play, reformers were glad. Soon all the narrow-minded ones had very much to say. But strange to state, the public looked on the shows with favor, and instead of playing out we like more and more their flavor. Old and young and rich and poor are constantly on the go, for there is no class division at the moving picture show.

Now comes the baseball romance to relieve the monotony of cowboy love affairs in the flitting film. It's this way. Mabel is a "bug" for fair. She simply cannot exist longer if the Highlanders, captained by Hal Chase, don't win the pennant. Also she won't marry Herbert, else. So on the date of the film making, the final game is being played between the Highlanders and Athletics. The New York park is shown. The Athletics are warming up for the fray. Herbert also is shown, warming up for desperate plaudits and Mabel—well, you ought to see Mabel!

The score gets into the ninth inning with the hated Athletics in the lead 2 to 0—as they frequently are off the film—and then Hal strides to the plate with two down in the ninth and two men on bases. Mabel is almost overcome.

"Stree-rike ONE!" You can see the umpire saw if off with his fateful right hand and you can imagine what the crowd is saying.

"Ba-a-w-wl ONE!"

Dancing and embracing in the stands. Pitcher warming up again. Hold your breath—hit it, Hal; Hal—hit—er—out for——

Bing!

A fierce wallop—see that outfielder sprinting for the fence. Gee—a homer! No, he's got the ball; he's throwing it home. Let go o' that man, Mabel, he's the wrong one. Run, Hal. Oh, you'll have to hurry. Here he comes from third, and there comes the ball. Slide—s-l-i-d-e, you LOBSTER! Will you behave, Mabel? Safe, SAFE A BLOCK! Leggo! LEGGO, I say! Everybody's looking. Hurray for Hal! Good old Hal!

Needless to comment further on the Hal Chase baseball film, which has finally reached the West and is standing 'em up everywhere. This film has quite an edge on gunplay and the pony express.

The pupils of St. James High School, Chicago, were entertained by a moving picture lecture on Yellowstone Park. The lecture was under the auspices of the Great Northern Railroad. The Chicago Athletic Association members were entertained with moving pictures entitled, "Industrial Resources of the South." The pictures included stages in the cotton industry.

Mrs. G. L. Chapman, of the Visiting Nurses' Association of Toledo, Ohio, visited Chicago recently with a view of utilizing moving pictures in the works of the association, both to interest the wealthy in the needs of the poor and to give easily comprehended instruction of hygiene and proper living to the people of the tenements.

BATTLE ON THE WESTERN RESERVE

Something Doing in Cleveland

By Sam Bullock

As forecasted in a recent letter, we are having "hot old times" just now in Mosestown, and the end of it all will be a complete organization of the moving picture managers of the Buckeye State. The League banner is flying from various prominent points and official organizers are "hotfooting" it after the "cold-feet" members of the fraternity. Every show owner is being asked very pointedly, "Are you with us or agin us?" We are working for a "round-up" that will make the statesmen open their eyes when the next Legislature convenes at Columbus. Quite a number of things have been "slipped over" on us through lack of organization in the past, but never no more. We shall be there with half a thousand editorial sheets (screens) hammering away for our rights and the statesmen will be compelled to listen. We are enlisting in the cause of the "uplift." Locally things are sizzling. Keith's "Hipp" recently ran Kinemacolor while holding a license from the Patents Company. The League members who use "Trust" films protested to the General Film Company that they were not allowed to book "features" outside of the "Trust" and insisted that the Patents Company play "square" and enforce the rule on big and little alike. The League members voted solidly to stand by thir "licensed" brethren. The demand was answered by the cancellation of the Hipp license. H. A. Daniels, Keith's manager, went "up in the air" at once and dire threats were made at the League members. He rushed over almost distracted to the Independent exchanges. To the first place he went upstairs three at a jump. "Say, gimme some film for Sunday; Willis's thrown the hooks in me and I gotta have a show from somewhere!" Now be it understood that the man thus addressed has a fine line of well-satisfied customers who have held him in great esteem since he arrived in this burg with his money-making "goods." He well knew that right up to that minute the Hipp "couldn't see Independent stuff," so he refused to share Daniel's excitement, and the best he could offer after due deliberation was about "ninety-day-old service"—and he didn't think the Buffalo office could do any better. The advantage of the "prestige" that his firm could gain by supplying the Hipp was pointed out to him, but he is a Missouri-Canadian, so there was "nothing doing."

Next, the new National Film Company was called upon, and Manager Kulp was actually too busy to talk to the Hipp man except to inform him that "our goods are exclusive and we are booked up too close to take even the Hip got more vicious. Then Daniels wrote each manother Richmond in the field.

He succeeded, however, in making temporary arrangements with the Lake Shore Film Company during the absence of President Mandelbaum from the city. This carried him over about a week. The Hipp used whatever was available, meantime going after the Exhibitors League real vicious. The members naturally made enquiries at the various exchanges, "Are you with us or agin us?" They didn't relish the idea of competing with a big fellow "with a program a mile long for a nickel and a newspaper coupon"—and all first runs.

Hence the enquiries. They were reassured. And the Hipp got more vicious. Then Daniels wrote each manager a real threatening letter and he was foxy enough not to mail it, and simultaneously he published a paper, "The Lens." The letter was just the kind of a missive that B. F. Keith would not write in a thousand years. It was dubbed "small potatoes" by a member of the prosecutor's office. "The Lens" was full of narrow-minded "knock-stuff" at the "picture shows" and special attention was called to the "unsafe and unsanitary condition" of the same. (Note what Prosecutor Cline says in commendation of our local shows, in clipping from yesterday's Leader enclosed).

Meantime another agreement was entered into with the Lake Shore in writing, covering a period of one week, and H. A. Daniels applied for an injunction to compel service by the Lake Shore, although all along boasting that he had "200 reels to draw upon from out of town," etc., same being "piffle."

The injunction case is not yet settled, but the showmen are awfully "sore" at some one else besides Daniels and explanations will be necessary—very necessary.

In the midst of this letter-writing, "Lens" publishing, injunction procuring hubbub Brother Daniels got a few punches in the ribs from "The Spotlight," a paper published by the managers especially for Mr. Daniels' benefit. It was well advertised upon the screens of local picture houses and distributed gratis to all patrons in wagon-loads. It made a hit and made Brother Daniels madder than ever, and he next appeared before the Grand Jury and had a bunch of good Cleveland citizens haled before that body for violation of the Valentine Anti-Trust Law, charging conspiracy between the Exhibitors League and the Film Exchanges. Certainly no exhibitor will ever tell an exchange not to supply the Hipp or any one else, and not even a Grand Jury can ever make a free-born American deal with a certain man when he can get better suited by dealing elsewhere.

As I have often said before, O-R-G-A-N-I-Z-E.

The following was written by the best posted reporter in Cleveland on things pertaining to our business, R. R. Stoddard, of the Leader:

Several of the best-known moving picture exhibitors of Cleveland, all members of the local league of exhibitors, were before the Grand Jury the past week, as witnesses in an investigation of a complaint made by H. A. Daniels, manager of Keith's Hippodrome. It was alleged that the anti-trust law has been violated in the action that keeps the Hipp from securing moving picture films through the local renting exchanges.

One result of the investigation is received with greatest satisfaction by the league members summoned as witnesses. Prosecutor Cline states that he has only commendation for the moving picture men and in the brief interview he learned many things to the advantage of the exhibitors. Cline declares that he is certain the moving picture men want to do only the right thing and that he found them anxious to live up to the letter of the law in every respect. He further stated that the exhibitors of Cleveland are doing much to elevate the business and he heartily approved of their methods.

Are Law-Abiding Men

"I find the moving picture men show a willingness and a good spirit in the observance of all the laws affecting their business. They do not want to do anything illegal. They convince me that their organization has a tendency toward eliminating everything objectionable in the pictures and not only showing pictures that are clean and uplifting but to conduct their theaters in a sanitary and safe manner. I commend them for their attitude in this respect.

"I believe the picture men are conducting their houses in a way to prevent immoral tendencies and to protect their audiences against danger of fire or unhealthy conditions."

The moving picture men never had a more thorough endorsement, they say, and they are glad of the opportunity to have the prosecuting attorney look into the methods of the league.

"We invite the closest investigation of our methods," said one prominent exhibitor recently. "Our league was formed for the mutual protection of the members. If we have violated any law in the regulation of the business of members we did so without intent, and certainly are glad to know that we discontinue any course that is not proper. benefit of the public. The inference that we have control of the film exchanges is absurd. We organized that we might present our claims to the exchanges with some weight.

Aim to Uplift Business.

"It is the purpose of the League of Motion Picture Exhibitors to uplift the business. We do not sanction the exhibition of any picture that is objectionable or upon which the authorities have placed the stamp of disapproval. We aim to make the small theaters as safe and wholesome as any places of amusement in the world. Our members make it their first duty to put their theaters in condition that guarantees to every person attending absolue safety at all times. Our machines and films are kept in fireproof booths, and we have all the necessary exits. We like fair competition. Those of us who get our films from the General Film Company are prohibited from running the films of any other makers, and we objected to others being permitted to mix their program. Our objection undoubtedly resulted in the General Film Company's refusal to supply the Hippodrome with pictures."

NESTOR RELEASES

"The Mills of the Gods grind slowly,
But they grind exceeding small."

The above is the inspiration for one of the finest Nestor releases which has been shown in some time. The story is well worked out. "The Mill of the Gods," as they have entitled their story, depicts the ravages of that human butterfly that flits constantly among the heart strings of susceptible man, delighting in the sorrows which she sprinkles so plentifully in her trail. But the "Mills of the Gods" though they grind slowly do grind exceeding fine, and so after due distribution of her venom, her flittering pinions at last find their well earned place in the mill that "grinds exceeding small."

This story should be a lesson to many careless ones to whom the only pleasure in life seems to be found by them in heart conquest. In the vast book of crimes too many can be traced back to this very thing.

POACHING DEALT WITH IN THANHOUSER PICTURE

The poacher and poaching are taken up by the Thanhouser producers in a story of the Adirondacks issued Friday, March 15th. It is called "The Poacher" and it is not all tragedy, as some might suspect, but solely a human-interest story that is very pretty and very comforting right through and that is mainly light and sunshine. The particular poacher wasn't a half bad fellow at all, and was largely driven to his deed by hard circumstances; unfortunately he was apprehended on the estate of a man who was the borough magistrate—and a hard one.

He immediately consigned the poacher to jail. This place was flimsily constructed, as county jails are, and the poacher succeeded in getting out.

Fleeing, he finds a hut and in it a little boy who is almost dying from the cold. The fugitive wraps the child in his own tattered coat and thereby saves his life. And, learning that the boy is the stern magistrate's son, our poacher even ventures to carry him to his father's door. The reader may guess the rest—how the magistrate did not decide to send the poacher to a stronger jail but, rather, gave him help and saved him from the commission of further transgression.

Harrisburg, Pa.—Plans and specifications for a new $100,000 theatre, to be erected at Third and Market streets, have been approved.

PERCY LEARNS TO WALTZ

Imp Comedy, March 16

Percy's decision to learn to waltz involved him and others in all sorts of difficulties and discomforts, and these adventures when seen on the screen, are highly diverting.

Percy caught the disease so badly that it became a monomania. He danced with everything and everybody he could. Unfortunately, he danced too much with the lady to whom he was not engaged. The lady who had the honor of being his fiancee, was incensed at this, as ladies are apt to be, and so there was a quarrel and an estrangement, and, of course, finally a reconciliation.

In the character of Percy, W. R. Cumpson, who has made himself such a great favorite with Imp audiences, finds an excellent opportunity of "letting himself go." So does Grace Lewis. So do, too, those fine comedians, W. R. Daly and H. S. Mack.

"Percy Learns to Waltz" is a characteristic, brisk Imp comedy; one of those Saturday offerings which are becoming so popular with Imp fans who like the lighter style of life portrayed on the screen.

EXHIBITORS LEAGUE OF PENNSYLVANIA

February 23, 1912.

Editor Moving Picture News,
30 W. 13th street, N. Y.

Dear Sir:—I beg to call your attention to the fact that the league has been gradually strengthened by the addition of new members and that the membership is now composed of proprietors who own the better class of places.

We have been successful in obtaining legislation to our interest not only in Philadelphia but through the Legislature at Harrisburg and were successful in having a bill passed concerning the censorship of the pictures and are also about to have an ordinance introduced concerning the admission of children into moving picture places during certain hours.

We are also endeavoring to co-operate with the municipal authorities here for the better conduct of the places and the moral tone of the pictures.

We also were successful in having a decision in the Common Court here under which moving picture places are not compelled to pay the state license of $500.

Yours very truly,

GEORGE H. ROTH,
Secretary.

A SONG OF LIFE

Some pictures don't require accompanying music—there is a note of melody that pervades and runs throughout them, a bar of the music of the soul, a strain of the song of our hearts. Of this character is the Rex release of Sunday, aptly and happily called "Songs of Childhood Days." It's a tale of a heart's forgetfulness and its remembrance, of a buried duty and its resurrection. The story proves that every cloud has a silver lining, and that every silver lining has a cloud. But in the last chapter night and its darkness are past, and dawn and the desire are realized.

The songs of our childhood days that float through our lives until the very day that they become a dirge, are in this instance the Messiah of a hope. They waft the melody of the past into the soul of a girl—a girl who has come to the city from a quiet country town and conquered it by the magic notes of her violin, but who in the glory and ecstasy of her triumph has forgotten the little mother who is waiting home—waiting, waiting for the victory and the glad things it synonymed. When the years transmit its message to the girl's heart and she remembers, she goes to her mother—and finds her in the poorhouse. Outside the door she plays "the songs of childhood days" and the mother's hungering ears hear the music of the past hope. Into her heart it steals and into her eyes come tears of joy and pain—and then only of joy when they behold her for whom all the months her heart had yearned.

It's a picture of life, with life. Viewing it we must acknowledge again that Rex knows life and the stuff of which it is made.

HEADQUARTERS FOR THEATRE FIXTURES

The Newman Manufacturing Co.

The successful business man knows that a great deal of his success results from proper advertising methods. The advertiser who sends in his ad with an accompanying note, "Please set up ad typographically attractive and neat," realizes that appearances go a long way in this world, and that in order to stand out well against the tricks to attract prominence of his competitors, he must also resort to the most modern and attractive tricks of the trade.

The theatre manager who understands the intricacies of capturing the best patronage possible knows that not only must the interior of his theatre be made attractive, but his posters, photographs, etc., must have their attractiveness enhanced by suitable settings, just as the artist paints his picture with a background of harmonious atmosphere and coloring, or the stage director sets his scene in the setting most suited to the subject of portrayal, so must the advertising matter in the front of a theatre be framed in dignified and attractive frames in order to give the proper tone of respectability and refinement to the theatre to which it belongs.

The entrance of a theatre is to the passerby most significant of the manner of place to expect within; therefore it is up to the theatre man to beautify the entrance as well as the interior of his theatre. For instance, a poster will look much better in an artistic brass frame, topped by scroll work of an attractive design, than in a plain wooden device which has absolutely no claim whatever to the slightest mark of beauty or forethought. In Cincinnati, O., at 717-819 Sycamore street, we find there is a most reliable firm which has given excellent satisfaction to those who have been fortunate enough to have had work done by them. This is the Newman Manufacturing Co. At this manufactory can be had all kinds of theatre fixtures—brass railing, brass easels, brass frames, brass wickets, kick plates, door guard rails, opera chairs, electric signs, electric fans, brass letters, and in fact everything pertaining either to decoration or usefulness in theatre fixtures.

The officers of this company are as follows: Samuel Newman, president; Sidney J. Newman, secretary and treasurer; W. J. Newman, assistant secretary, and E. Newman, assistant treasurer.

HOW A PROPERTY FIRE IS MADE

Barry O'Neil, managing director of one of the Lubin stock companies, receives a scenario of a photo play. It is a melodramatic story, which to the experienced director is perfectly easy, except that he must make a fire scene, with all the circumstance and excitement of the real thing. He approaches the principals of the firm and tells them that there is no fire reported in town, and he must have a fire that afternoon, as the production is late. "Well," replies Mr. Lubin, "make one." O'Neil explains that it will cost much money, and the firm replies, "No matter what it costs, make the fire." The stage manager goes out on a hurried quest, and not far from the plant he finds an empty house in a row of pretty cottages. The landlord is sent for and a deal for the rehearsal is quickly made, with a guarantee that the house shall not be burned down and all damages shall be paid for. A 'phone is sent to the nearest fire station. An engine and crew of firemen are secured and quickly on the spot, followed by the usual crowd, which pretty soon numbers four or five hundred. Here is the necessary mob. O'Neil brings his players to the scene, and, standing in the middle of the road, directs the scene. A few preliminary instructions and all hands go to work. Smoke is seen issuing from the top-story window. The engine dashes around the corner and the firemen get down to business. A half-dozen axes smash in the door and lower windows, and the firemen enter. Ladders are placed at the upper windows, which are quickly demolished. A child is brought out of the door, then three or four men and women are dragged through the upper windows by the firemen and brought down to safety. The mob cheers the rescues. A property man of the plant is one of the workers at the scene. A little dog, Trixie, is always at his heels, and as the man dashes into the burning building the dog fearlessly follows. Presently the dog is seen to jump from one of the windows and receives a round of applause. There is still one woman in the burning house. The smoke is now dense and the flames belch from the windows. The rescued ones urge the firemen to save the heroine of the playlet. One daring man rushes up the ladder to the top floor. He climbs into the window. The crowd shriek and cover their eyes at the fearful sight. Presently the fireman appears at the window. One arm clasps May Buckley around the waist. Stepping out upon the ladder, he drags the senseless form out and carries her, head first, to the ground. The mob embrace the rescued woman and the brave fireman. Miss Buckley quickly slips out of the picture and trots off back to the studio. The flames and smoke clear away. The house, except for the broken windows, looks none the worse for the rehearsal. How are the smoke and flames made? You must ask the chemist.

Daily Consular and Trade Reports of Moving Pictures Abroad

FRANCE

(From Consul Charles A. Holder, Rouen.)

The moving picture business in France is very different from that in the United States. The business day, commencing at 6.30 in the morning for laborers and at 8 o'clock for stores, is interrupted at midday for two hours so that employees may have time to go home for dinner. They are very busy the rest of the day and as a consequence cinematograph theaters have no performances during the day except on Sundays and fete days. Profits, therefore, must be made from relatively few performances and higher prices for admission are charged; these prices run from about 9 cents to as much as 77 cents. The performance usually lasts two hours, starting at 9 p.m. and ending at 11 p.m. On Sundays and fete days there are usually two matinees, one from 2 to 4 p.m. and the other from 4 to 6 p.m. The attendance is largely made up of more or less regular patrons so that the program is changed only once a week, as a French working man would seldom think of spending money in this way more than once a week.

The films used in this district are nearly all rented either from the manufacturers direct or from companies in Paris formed for the especial purpose of buying and renting these machines. The best market open to American manufacturers is that offered by these companies.

(From Consul General A. Gaulin, Marseilles.)

Method of Conducting the Business

There are about thirty-five moving picture theaters in Marseilles, the combined receipts of which were $237,619 in 1910. The machines used are almost exclusively of French make, and are usually hired by the theaters from the local dealers or agents of the manufacturers, the rent running from $9.65 to $17.37 a month. There is room for a good American machine, but very little business could be done with the theaters direct.

Films are also rented from Marseilles dealers, who obtain them from the Paris representatives of the manufacturers. Rental prices run from about 4.8 cents per meter (3.28 feet) for new films to 1.9 cents for "fourth week" films.

The leading dealers here would welcome offers from first-class American houses, as they desire to be less dependent upon the domestic manufacturers. A recent attempt at the monopolization of the trade has greatly stimulated the purchase of foreign supplies. Several dealers are seeking connections with firms willing to place their films on deposit, to be returned after exhibition during a sufficient period.

A comprehensive list of cinematograph establishments will be found in the Annuaire de la Cinematographie, published by the Société Fermière des Annuaires, 53 Rue Lafayette, Paris. The price of this publication is 6.75 francs ($1.30).

(From Consul J. E. Haven, Roubaix.)

Number of Exhibitions

In the three principal cities of the district, viz., Lille, Roubaix, and Tourcoing, there are perhaps 100 halls and estaminets (saloons) where moving pictures are shown, the latter being very popular, as an entire evening can be spent there pleasantly at a cost of not more than 10 or 15 cents for beer, this being the only expense incidental to the entertainment.

The films used are in nearly every case rented from four film dealers in Lille. They rent for $0.60 to $1.20 per month. The same dealers also rent the moving picture machines, although in some instances the machine is owned by the exhibitor. All correspondence should be addressed to these dealers and should be in French.

NORWAY

(From Consul General Henry Bordewich, Christiania.)

There are at present some twenty moving picture shows in Christiania, the machines for which were imported from France and Denmark. There are two manufacturers of films in this district, and besides their output about 160,000 meters of foreign films are imported, mostly from France and the United States.

Each foreign manufacturer of films has his representative for Norway in this city, who sells films to the local theaters, and these again let them out to other shows in the country at a reasonable fee. Terms for sale of films differ, three months' credit being sometimes given.

The Norwegian import duty on films is 1.2 crowns (32.2 cents) per kilo (2.2 pounds). The import duty on moving picture machines will vary according to the material from which they are manufactured.

(From Consul B. M. Rasmusen, Bergen.)

There are in this city nine moving picture shows, at which the receipts in 1910 amounted to $52,000. Comic films seem to be most popular, with historical and scenic pictures next. All machines are French, but films are imported from several countries.

(From Consul P. E. Taylor, Stavanger.)

There are six French and two Danish machines in the eight moving picture shows in this city. These establishments have an average daily attendance of about 450, and their total receipts yearly run about $40,00. Films are nearly all rented from Christiania.

Several of the shows here buy new machines every year, and the others every other year. The proprietors of the three largest shows said if they could be shown that American machines are superior to those now in use they would not hesitate to buy them, even though the price should be considerably higher.

TURKEY

(From Vice Consul John L. Binda, Saloniki.)

American cinematograph films are easily the most popular shown in Saloniki. During the summer an outdoor moving picture theater was established quite a distance from the most populated sections of the city. However, it was able to do a good business by promising to show several films from a certain American company each week. When the theater had worked up a good patronage it substituted cheaper European films. Immediately business fell off and only by promising to increase the number of American films could it win back its lost patronage. One manager says that the people prefer American films because of their clearness, their intricate plots, and the vivacity and naturalness of the actors, the American heroine being especially popular. Films showing the exploits of American detectives are well liked.

There is an excellent opportunity for an American company to establish a theater here showing only American films. This could be started with an outdoor show that could run five months during the year and earn enough money so that a place for the winter could be built. There is no other form of amusement in this city and the population of 200,000 must depend on three cinematograph theaters for entertainment.

Levant Kinematograph Co.

The other day we announced the formation in London of the Levant Kinematograph Co. (Ltd.), with a capital of $50,000, to take over the patent rights for Turkey in Asia of the Natural Color Kinematograph Co., of London. We now learn from Smyrna that the company has acquired a suitable site on the quay, and the building is expected to be open next month. We understand that the same company has acquired the rights also for Greece and Egypt, and that it is intended to open exhibitions in these countries later. The electric installation is in local hands, and a considerable part of the fittings have been ordered from British makers. The engines—two horizontal electric lighting type, internal combustion, each developing 25 candle horsepower—are from Gardner & Sons (Ltd.), of Patricroft; the ammeters and voltmeters are from Frankfort, Germany; the wires and cables are of British make. Six arc lamps, Korting & Mathiessen system, of 2,500 candlepower each, and 1,250 metallic filament lamps supply the light.

SHAMUS O'BRIEN

The poem of "Shamus O'Brien," by the gifted author J. S La Fanu, is a favorite with Irishmen all over the world, because it crystalizes a desire that is deep down in the hearts of countless millions of Irishmen for the freeing of Ireland from official association with England, in other words, "Home Rule" for Ireland.

In the year 1798 Ireland was in a state of rebellion against England. The events of this period in Ireland are known as the great Irish Rebellion. Ireland was more or less united to Great Britain. She had long ago lost her king, but she cherished an ambition for her separate parliament, separate government, separate nobility and everything. Members of the Irish aristocracy were concerned in the rebellion. The entire south of Ireland was in revolt against English rule. Irishmen died rather than submit to the dictates of English soldiers. Even to-day there is something of the old antipathy to English rule in the south of Ireland.

This sentiment has been successfully preserved and conserved in the south part of Ireland, so that for the last thirty years there has grown up in that part of Ireland the demand for what is called "Home Rule," that is, government of themselves by themselves as distinct from English rule.

Dublin, the capital of Ireland, has its parliament house, its judicature. The country has its own nobility and at the present time, the British Government in London is seriously considering granting Ireland "Home Rule."

But unfortunately, however, the problem is not such a simple one as it appears. The north of Ireland wants to remain an integral part of Great Britain. There is something of a parallel here between the case of the United States of America over fifty years ago, and the case of Ireland to-day and in the year 1798.

The south of Ireland in 1798 wanted to secede from the United Kingdom. It wants to do so to-day. The north of Ireland then and now wants to hold on to the union. At the time of the American Civil War, the attempt of the South to secede gave opportunity for many displays of personal heroism. The South were fighting their brothers and they fought with all the bitterness of brothers.

Now, then, we get the same sort of an idea of the condition of things in Ireland in the year 1798 which the poem of "Shamus O'Brien" describes and, upon which the Imp drama of that name is built. The English soldiery were in possession of the country, and Shamus, otherwise James, O'Brien, was a rebel against the government typified by the English soldiers, and the hearts of the people were with Shamus. No doubt the hearts of the English soldiers were also with him, but it was their duty to enforce law and order.

Shamus was a rebel—he was "agin" the government, he was a broth of a boy, with a lovable sweetheart. His friends liked him, the priest liked him, but, of course, he had an enemy in the shape of an informer, who gave Shamus away and caused him to be put in jail for the terrible crime of taking arms against the British.

So Shamus was brought before the judge, tried and sentenced. The intercession of his old mother was unavailing. The judge, stern man, had to administer justice. The jury found Shamus guilty of high treason and for such an offense there was only one punishment: death by hanging, and the judge pronounced the sentence.

In fighting for his country, Shamus was fighting against his country's masters, the English, and the English judge condemned him to death. The finest scene of all takes place on the scaffold. Shamus' arms are bound, the executioner is present and so is good Father Malone below, to administer the last consolation of religion to Shamus.

Now Father Malone, the "soggarth aroon," was a human and humane man, and it's shrewdly to be suspected that while he was whispering ghostly counsel into the ear of Shamus, he unbound his fetters. Anyhow, Shamus makes one daring spring for liberty, leaps to the ground and, notwithstanding the hullabaloo of soldiers, sheriffs, the mob and others manages to make his escape, jump on his horse and "get away with it," as we say in modern America.

The sentiment of this story is plain to the point of simplicity. Shamus was a rebel and, according to his lights, a just rebel. He was a rebel rightly struggling to be free. He beat his oppressors and in fighting his oppressors he had the sympathy of all his friends and neighbors. Shamus was just a bright, breezy, good-natured, lovable Irishman. He had personality and having personality, the whole countryside sympathized with him, felt for him, worked for him and aided him in his escape.

The Imp Films Company, their directors and acting staff have seized upon this fine theme to produce a magnificent two reel subject full of atmosphere—it is an Irish play produced under Irish direction and acted by Irish men and women, who all entered into the very marrow of the theme.

King Baggot is Shamus, and Baggot does the finest piece of work of his career in the part. W. R. Daly is the informer against Shamus, and Daly is great. The English captain is played by W. E. Shay; Shay is Irish, but he is so good an actor he can look English. The part of Shamus' mother is in capable hands. Mr. Balfour, as the priest, acts with dignity. Vivian Prescott, as the colleen who is Shamus' sweetheart, is as pretty as a picture.

The photography, the settings and stage management of this picture are perfect. It is a fine specimen of thorough directing.

The Imp Films Company feel that in this piece of work they have put out the finest effort which has marked their career as manufacturers of moving pictures. It will be a world-wide success.

GREAT NORTHERN SPECIAL FEATURE FILM CO.

An entirely new and novel scheme for the distribution of its special feature productions has been adopted by the Great Northern Special Feature Film Company. It sells its films at a much lower rate than any other feature film company, which enables its customers to have several big features on hand at one time, allowing theatre managers to follow up one feature after another. The first release, "A Victim of the Mormons," had a very successful reception, but smiling Charles Abrams, general manager, is even more optimistic about the second release, which was ready for distribution the week of February 19th, entitled, "The Nihilist's Conspiracy."

Charles says the psychological moment has now arrived and hopes that those having the opportunity will take advantage of same.

Mr. Abrams announces that Mr. R. H. Mason, formerly manager of the Consolidated Film Exchange, has resigned from the above company and has organized the Great Southern Feature Film Company, at Atlanta, Ga., and is handling the State rights of North and South Carolina, Florida, Georgia and Tennessee for the three-reel subject, "A Victim of the Mormons."

AMERICAN TO RELEASE NEW SCENIC

On Thursday, March 18th, the American Film Mfg. Company, emboldened by the success which greeted its scenic on Southern California, released last December, will put out another scenic which promises to exceed its predecessor.

"Winter Sports and Pastimes at Coronado Beach," is the title of the new picture which will contemplate some of those joyous winter sports, such as hockey, swimming, boat racing, etc. The film should prove popular if the success which greeted the other is any criterion for judgment. The American public, tired of the long winter, longs for a touch of summer and turns instinctively toward those things which suggest summer. The picture covers some charming views of sunny California that will interest those who have enjoyed the real experience quite as much as those less fortunate.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

Industrial Scripts

A number of the scenario writers who answered advertisements that appeared in the trade journals about a year ago asking for the names of writers are profiting thereby. The concerns wishing the names and addresses of writers were in the field for industrial scripts. We know of several authors who were given trial assignments by the industrial film companies, made good, and are enjoying a source of revenue outside of the regular stuff. It is believed that advertising stories woven about some well-known commodity will be more and more in demand and the writers who watched the advertising columns closely and are in "on the ground floor" with their wares are the boys who are going to get the "dough."

Discouraging Statement

Extract from a letter from a well-known scenario editor and author: "This is an off season for script sales. Nearly all the concerns have companies in the West or South and the directors and actors write the stuff to fit the locale and the weather. Ordinarily about ten per cent of the stories put on are bought from the outside. You can't make it too strong that about ninety per cent of the scenario writers are wasting their time and postage."

A Remedy Suggested

The above assertion comes from a recognized authority in the editorial end of the business. It is worthy of consideration. It is always an off season for script sales for those who work carelessly and plagiarize. What is essential is painstaking work, originality and thought. When more writers appreciate the fact, the per cent of outside script sales will become larger.

Two-reel Stories

Two writers have asked us to designate markets for two-reel subjects. In reply we should state that they should read the News more closely. The Bison Company is advertising for good Western two-reel subjects. Full particulars will be found in the Bison advertisement in back files of this journal. Adaptations from novels should not be attempted by the average writer. This work is generally done by the office staff of writers and it is a loss of time to attempt such work unless ordered.

For Mutual Benefit

The editor of this department would be delighted to hear from those who are engaged in the profession of scenario writing. Let us get together for mutual benefit. Many of the readers of the News can relate interesting experiences in the scenario writing line which will be beneficial to others. We wish you to feel free to use this department and any queries propounded will be answered, either in this department or by mail, provided a self-addressed envelope is enclosed. Let us work together, help ourselves and the long-suffering scenario editor.

Comic Scripts

South Bend, Indiana, asks if comic scripts are now in demand. Evidently South Bend is new at the profession or he is sarcastic. Taking the inquiry seriously, it can be said that there is always a market for a good comic story—one not too far fetched. The best prices are paid for comedy containing original ideas, and the fresh comedy plot that reaches any editorial office is eagerly read. There is a dearth of comedy, real comedy, we should add. The uncle and nephew comedy and the elopement plots are no longer funny.

Hoadley Joins Champion

C. B. Hoadley, former scenario editor of the Imp Films Co., has joined the Champion Film Company forces as scenario editor and publicity agent. Mr. Hoadley's many friends and admirers will be pleased to hear that he has donned the spangles once more. There is no editor in exchange experiences and information and in so doing the business who has more friends that Mr. Hoadley.

With Comet Company

Horace Vinton, former scenario editor for the American and Shamrock Companies, has been engaged by the Comet Company as editor of scenarios. Many writers who have been complaining that scripts sent the Comet Company about a year ago, remain in that office without acknowledgment, will now find an entirely different state of affairs. Those who have dealings with Mr. Vinton will find him a conscientious and courteous editor, always on the lookout for talent and endeavoring to please. Mr. Vinton will likely do some producing for the Comet Company before long. Comet is to be congratulated upon contracting with such a versatile writer and popular gentleman as Horace Vinton. Writers need have no hesitancy in submitting their work to Editor Vinton.

Mrs. Rubenstein's Venture

Lillian M. Rubenstein, of the Lubin Manufacturing Company, writes that she has decided to conduct a correspondence school for the perfecting of writers in the art of scenario writing. Mrs. Rubenstein writes that her wide experience in the moving picture field, enabled her to bring into this enterprise an intelligent conception of just what is required and how to impart this knowledge to others.

Correspondence Schools

The announcement by Mrs. Rubenstein, anent the conducting of a correspondence school for scenario writers, is interesting because of many inquiries that we have received in the past few weeks regarding the merits of this and that school professing to teach the art of script writing to those ambitious to succeed in the new field of literary endeavor. We have been able to recommend but one bureau to would-be authors because there is but one individual in the field to-day that comes out fairly and above board in his profession. Mr. Epes Winthrop Sargent, of New York City, has been conducting a school of criticism and revision. We have investigated and can state that his methods are satisfactory and, from reports received from writers, they are pleased with his instruction.

A different story is told about the methods of certain schools, so-called. Generally the literary aspirant has been disappointed, being led to believe that a course of lessons would qualify one to successfully market all scripts written. Of course, no school of instruction can furnish brains, but some of these courses can supply so much technique that whatever originality the writer once possessed is lost in a maze of technicalities.

The idea and its proper development is the thing. If you have a fresh and novel plot and work out its possibilities convincingly and plausibly, nine times out of ten, the technique will take care of itself. If you wish a script revised send it along to an acknowledged authority, some one who has made good. We cannot recommend any schools, now advertising to the writers.

"Twenty-five to $100 paid for Moving Picture Plots; Art Easily Learned; No Education Necessary," sounds good in an advertisement. But the art is learned only through unceasing work and there is not a freelance writer in the game to-day that pulls down $100 for a moving picture plot.

Edison Profiting Thereby

Because the Edison Company has decided to give recognition to authors of meritorious playlets, the scenario editor of that concern is profiting thereby. Edison is receiving many scripts from first-class writers who previously submitted their best work to other favored manufacturers. Edison deserves recognition from experienced writers because that company has taken the initial step toward giving the author his due. It is hoped that other companies will emulate the good example set by the Edison Company and give credit on the film to deserving playwrights. Picture play "dope" is one of the most difficult arts in the literary world to-day. The author of "Nick Carter" and "Dead-Eye Dick" has his or her name emblazoned on the covers of the novel but the author of the silent drama remains unhonored and unsung. We hope that within a few months that every film released will bear the author's name thereon. "Ultimately! Why not now?"

THE MARGRAVE'S DAUGHTER

Gaumont

April 6th will witness the release of another Gaumont hand-colored picture, even better than the two former Independent releases of "The Christian Martyrs" and "Heaven's Messenger." The forthcoming hand-colored masterpiece is entitled "The Margrave's Daughter," consisting of about 1,220 feet and depicting one of the stateliest court pageants and stories that has ever been projected on any screen. Particular interest has already been shown by those few theatre proprietors who got a glimpse of this picture when the Gaumont representative demonstrated it recently in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and the South Atlantic Coast region. The exhibitors realize the unapproachable superiority of Gaumont pictures over those of any other manufacturer's and complain bitterly at their Exchanges whenever they try to excuse their own negligence by trying to make the exhibitor believe that several notoriously poor brands, that they deem it advisable to handle, are equally as satisfactory. The exhibitor, however, knows better and refuses to be hoodwinked by any of the false persuasions of the various Exchanges. The calibre of Gaumont products, particularly the hand-coloreds, together with the topical nature of the Gaumont Weekly, has made the Independent theatre owner realize that the Independent field possesses one manufacturer, at least, whose reliability and quality never vary. It is for that reason that the announcement of the April 6th hand-colored reel, "The Margrave's Daughter," has been so enthusiastically greeted. Every live exhibitor who lays any claim to conducting his theatre on a businesslike basis is arranging bookings for "The Margrave's Daughter." Feature companies are ordering it right and left, convinced of the fact that they will be able to do more with this feature than they could even do with "The Christian Martyrs" and "Heaven's Messenger," both of which registered distinct successes on the American market.

"The Margrave's Daughter" reveals the story of a young girl whose love for a nobleman is strenuously opposed by her father, the Margrave, a title of nobility corresponding to the French marquis. The two lovers, despite the father's disapproval, attempt to elope from the castle, only to be frustrated at the postern portal. The lover, after a combat with the Margrave's knights on the bridge crossing the moat, is finally captured and condemned to decapitation, after being adjudged guilty of treason. On the day of the execution, midst the elaborate ceremonies for which the days of chivalry and knighthood are renowned, the young nobleman and his father confessor are slowly led to the platform where the executioners, their axes and the death-block are awaiting. The Margrave, his courtiers and their retinues are in the box overhead, prepared to witness the young nobleman's death. A surprise is in store when the priest and the proscribed one reveal their identity, the priest as the young lover, the doomed martyr as the Margrave's daughter, she having changed clothes with her lover quite unknown to all. The Margrave is baffled as they embracingly kneel side by side and lay their heads on the block together. The stay of execution is ordered and instead the ardent couple are proclaimed man and wife.

The revelation of the identity of the dark garbed priest and his doomed charge, comes as a complete surprise to all, forming one of the greatest dramatic climaxes ever accomplished. The whole picture throughout is of equal strength and quality, a fact which accounts for the eagerness displayed by the exhibitors in booking it. The unusual quality of its hand-coloring will make an extra charge of $30.00, which barely meets the expenses incurred in the color process.

HALLBERG A. C. TO D. C. MOTOR GENERATOR SET FOR STAR THEATRE

Mr. Carl Michelfelder, who owns a number of motion picture theatres in different cities, two of them being in Fall River, Mass., has just placed an order with Mr. J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," for one of his 40 to 60 Ampere Motor Generator Sets, for changing A. C. to D. C. at the arc. Mr. Michelfelder has been trying in vain to get a satisfactory means of changing A. C. to D. C. with 40 amperes D. C. at the arc, and when he saw Mr. Hallberg's device demonstrated, immediately placed an order for one of his Fall River houses.

NOTES OF THE WEEK

THE moving picture has come to be the amusement of the people. It belongs to the people. It is the recreation and educational paradise of the poor. Yet there are a few unscrupulous individuals who have already agitated a combine of the moving picture theatres in the cities in which they live. It is now recognized as the most profitable entertainment in the business, then why speculate further with what has come to be essentially the amusement of the poor?

In New York City there is a talk of opening a general moving picture theatre at $1.50. This is permissible so long as no combine follows as a consequence.

In Europe, the home of music, the best of art in its highest forms can be seen and heard for a few pennies. There art lives, and flourishes, and grows. Music and art in Italy, Austria, Germany and France is an essential part of the lives of the people. In our America the poisonous shekel has become such a factor even where art is concerned, that unarmed, with a hammer and tongs tenacity, the true artist might as well throw up his arms at once.

In the moving picture theatre proper, we have the power to promote and cultivate the spirit of art; the opportunity to educate as well as amuse. Then let us do all we can to keep intact the circle of cheap moving picture theatres, and to keep them clean, and wholesome in sentiment and environment, for remember they are destined to be the schools of our poor, the people who are to be the future rulers of our cities.

Says the Daily Consular and Trade Reports for February 20th, "Recently a number of moving picture theatres in Russia have been displaying a few films depicting American life, most of them being Indians and Western pictures." An American consul writes that these films are so entirely different from the usual subjects displayed, and seem to be so much appreciated, that a good business could be worked up in American films. He suggests that descriptive matter with prices and discounts be sent to a number of firms whose names are furnished. Correspondence with these firms should be preferably in Russian, but German would be better than English.

An Indianapolis company proposes manufacturing a projecting machine which will fit into a man's pocket. This machine will also be equipped with an attachment for showing slides. This "new kink" is suggested as an aid to drummers in the display and demonstration of their goods. In this way, for instance, the operations of different kinds of machinery can be demonstrated without a journey to the factory.

"Oedipus Rex," the Greek drama, as presented by Professor Max Reinhardt at La Scala Theatre, London, will be reproduced at the Kinemacolor Theatre, on Fortieth street, on Monday evening, March 4th. There will be a specially arranged musical accompaniment running through all five acts. Charles Urban, inventor of the Kinemacolor process, refers to the coming reproduction here as "the most ambitious of my company." It was acted by actors in the hill country near Nice, and the settings there, to be shown in the natural color motion films, are said to add materially to the effectiveness of the reproduction.

The moving picture show, frequently charged with teaching the young idea to shoot in the wrong direction, is to be made an ally of the school room in instructing the pupils of Columbus schools in geography. The board of education has contracted with a nickel theatre to present one afternoon each week, moving picture films selected by Superintendent Shenk, which will depict life among the people of whom the children are studying in geography. Superintendent Shenk thinks this will add interest to the geography work and also have a tendency to improve the general tone of the picture shows.

The building with a moving picture machine of a great transcontinental highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific, suitable for the use of motorists, is one of the many wonders now to be found in this country. The moving picture machine, showing pictures of the ocean-to-ocean tour of twelve Premier cars, is now doing practically all of the work on this great project, but indications are that as soon as the rigorous weather of the winter months has passed, its efforts will be augmented by hundreds of steam plows, shovels and other road-building implements in a dozen different States.

Travelers on the underground railways of London will be treated to the joys of a cinematograph entertainment soon. Pictures showing the merits of food specialties or the waltz scene from the latest musical comedy are to be displayed on the walls of the tubes. Rapidly moving trains will give the illusion of animation to the pictures. Gordon B. Daniels, manager-director of a cinematograph company, said the difficulty of achieving the illusion had been overcome by an ingenious system of intermittent electric lighting behind the pictures.

What's the best way for a traveling man to "kill" spare time in a "jerk-water" town?

A straw vote was taken to-day on this question by a group of traveling men gathered about their grips at the Union depot waiting for a train. Some one "sprung" the question and an animated discussion ensued. The favorite ways of "killing time" and their relative popularity showed that:

Moving picture shows appealed to seven.
Card games struck the fancy of four.
Writing "the girl" occupied two.
Studying law lured one.
Sleeping fascinated five.

"Every man to his taste," commented Carl Secor, one of the group.

Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt entertained sixty guests at her home, 667 Fifth avenue, on Thursday evening, February 22d, with a private exhibition of the "Durbar in Kinemacolor." Only one set of these color films was brought to America, and is being shown at the New York Theatre. After each reel was shown at the theatre it was taken to the Vanderbilt home in a taxicab. The private exhibition took place in the ballroom.

Negotiations are under way for presenting the works of Mark Twain in moving picture plays. The first ones which will be presented, it is understood, are "Tom Sawyer" and "Huckleberry Finn." The picturesque elements in works such as these have appealed to the makers of the films, and there have been several consultations between them recently and Harper & Brothers, Mark Twain's publishers.

President Taft was again a target for a battery of moving picture camera men, when on his way to place a wreath on the tomb of Washington. The secret service men and guards were ordering the persistent cameraites back when the President requested that they should not be disturbed.

The great possibilities of this modern, semi-scientific amusement and educational feature in the uplift of the masses has been long recognized and as an adjunct to religious teachings it has proved most serviceable. Think of the life-like reproductions of the man who fell among thieves, on his way from Jerusalem to Jericho, for example, as a stimulus to the young to attend the mid-week meetings or Sabbath evening popular pulpit talks! The visible drama in Biblical motion pictures would make the Gospel shows as vivid and as well-attended as those of the five and ten-cent variety in the down-town district devoted to the Dick Deadeye and stage hold-up border spasms.

That this is no fanciful notion is evidenced by what has been done by the pastor of the South Congregational Church, of New Britain, Conn., who in groping with the problem, "How to make the church more interesting?" hit upon the film exhibiting experiment as a drawing card and so proved the efficacy of the motion picture machine consecrated to religious ends that South Church is now the most popular edifice in New Britain Sunday nights.

'Tis said that when she witnessed for the first time the photo-play in which she was the chief performer, upon the screen, she was almost hysterical with excitement, asking at the finish that the reels be run over again. The results are positively marvelous."

KINEMACOLOR

Coincident with the arrival in this country of Mr. Charles Urban, inventor of the Kinemacolor, and the inauguration of a new era in the management of the affairs of the Kinemacolor Company of America, comes the announcement that the present board of directors of that prosperous corporation (of which Mr. Henry J. Brock is president) have made a most strategic move in selecting Edward E. Pidgeon as the general publicity promoter of the company.

The Kinemacolor Company has surprised all of the wiseacres in metropolitan circles during the past fortnight by the unheard-of innovation of leasing a Broadway playhouse—the New York Theatre—for a period of six weeks at a rental of $2,500 weekly, and showing there are gorgeous Kinemacolor pictures of the dazzling Indian Durbar to the fabulous profit of more than $5,000 for the first seven days of their tenancy, and by the announcement today that they have secured no less a famous duo of stellar personages than Madame Sarah Bernhardt and Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree to pose in their most notable characterizations for a series of films shortly to be shown by this company in the principal cities of the United States and Canada.

The fact that the Kinemacolor Company has annexed the expert services of "Eddie" Pidgeon to promote their interests indicates plainly that they "have thrown their hat into the ring" of the moving picture field, wherein soon we may expect to hear of big things doing. Mr. Pidgeon is a newspaper man of sterling worth, knows the full value of news thoroughly, turns out high grade copy, has an imaginative mind and a facile pen, and with his advent in the arena a new era in publicity securing is assured. He was for years the dramatic editor of the New York Press, resigning from that position to promote the affairs of William Morris, Inc. It was he who was responsible for the name "William Morris" becoming a household word among the patrons of vaudeville. While with Mr. Morris he directed the tours of Harry Lauder, secured page upon page of newspaper space for that wonderful, educated chimpanzee, "Consul the Great"; developed Maud Odell, "the Sandow Girl"; a $250 vaudeville act into a headline attraction worth ten times the contract price as a box-office attraction, and achieved many other noteworthy feats of publicity for his employers. More recently he has been the editor of a weekly publication devoted to theatricals.

Mr. Pidgeon steps into his berth with the Kinemacolor Company bearing the best wishes of hosts of friends in both the newspaper field and the theatrical world throughout the country.

Farmington, Ill.—D. B. McFarland sold the Dreamland Theater to Mayor H. V. Johnson and is moving to Charlestown where he will open a new theater there.

AN INTERESTING AUSTRALIAN LETTER

Sydney, New South Wales, January 15, 1912.
Alfred H. Saunders, Editor of The Moving Picture News,
New York City.

Dear Sir:—By the last mail steamer in from the other side, the Marama, came a bunch of people all bent on adding some of the Australian coin to their store of the yellow metal, and at the same time to try and revolutionize the film business on this side of the world; but up to the time of writing, I am not in a position to say very much as regards what they have done, but from all that I can make out of what little hot air has been measured out to me, it looks as if there was more trust, or bust business, on the eve of formation, to squeeze out the small fry, and make more room for the large fish; but as it has been said that "All things come to those who wait," there may come something good, or there may be much that is bad in the game that is just in process of beginning, but be that as it may, of that I will try and keep your readers posted as regards every move that is made, and if I think that it is going to be a move to crowd the weaker members of the moving picture business out of the game, to make room for the larger companies and combines, then I am up against them all of the time, and shall not hesitate to express my opinions pretty freely on the subject that I have made a very careful study of all the years that the still drama has been exploited.

There has been told the story of the frog who became so puffed up with his own importance that he met with a disastrous ending, and such may be the new game that has only just began to germinate, and has not got so far as to even put forth a single root yet, so while there is something in the wind all on the surface of the same looks to me like as if it was more trust work; but no trust to any but those with unlimited capital at their command, and keep the cream for the swell ones, and the curds and whey for the little fish, and try to sicken them out of the game.

I rather fancy that they will meet with a good bit of opposition in the new scheme, but of that I have no right to say more than it is simply my own views of the matter, and they probably don't cut much of a figure when it comes to that, but all the same when there is anything doing, and I think that it is all for the strong with everything against the weak; then I am always going to lend a helping hand to the losing side and try and see if there cannot be something done to keep them in the swim, and let them live as well as the others.

Methinks if there is an hereafter—and I guess that there is but very little doubt in the minds of most people as regards that,—that when the great ledger gets opened up, and some of those big guns in the financial world hear their record read out by the recording angel, that there will be something doing on that day, and those who were the originators of trusts and combines will hear the juice being turned on, and see the grid well heated up, and everything made ready for the great auditing and balancing of the books, and when it is told that they are to get on the trust express and go down to the head grill, and be roasted, then there will be some of the small fry—who had theirs on this earth,—will have a good chance to get back on their grillers on earth, and make sure that the grilling is well and truly done, if it is not as I say, then it at least should be so, for sure Mike we will not have to stand by and see the ones who grilled us on earth have the pleasure of grilling us in the great hereafter for that would be playing it pretty low down were such to be the facts in the second edition of the game. Let us hope that the poor on this earth will get a good chance at their tormentors in the good time that the good book says is a-coming.

Mr. J. D. Williams, managing director of The Greater J. D. Williams Amusement Company, Limited, Mr. Leon Phillips, treasurer, and Mr. E. Lindsay Thompson, an alderman of this city, and the architect of the company, as well as Crystal Palace, Limited, Mr. W. H. Bell and wife, well known in the film business, and several others who cut no figure in the moving picture business, arrived by the R. M. S. S. "Marama," December 24th, and were tendered on Sunday, December 31st ult, a picnic by Mr. and Mrs. Bud Atkinson, at "Kalarney," one of the beauty spots of Sydney Harbor up Middle Harbor. About sixty sat down to a fine old collation, and made the roast turkey and all the other viands look pretty small. When all had supplied the inner man, and after all had partaken of the many good things provided by the host and his most charming wife, glasses were charged and several toasts were honored in various kinds of liquids that did not steal away the brains too much, and as the day was not too hot and neither too cool, iced drinks were much more in demand than others, but the prevailing drinks seemed to be on the side of temperance, as I was delighted to see, and there were many nice little things said, and as night was beginning to gather near, we all went on the motor boat that was employed for the occasion, and after a tour of inspection over the house boat of one of the directors of the company, and refreshments had been handed round with a fine memento of the day's celebration, each lady being handed with her glass a very appropriate gift by the owner, Mr. Williamson, the company again boarded the boat and made their way to the city. As Mr. J. D. Williams had to be at the S. C. grounds for the starting of the six days' bicycle contest at 12:05 Monday, January 1, 1912, all were safely landed at their various wharfs, and were soon speeding their way homeward after bidding host and hostess a very cordial wish of thanks for the grand spread placed before their guests. After wishing them both many happy and prosperous New Years, and much wealth added to their already well filled store of the same, your scribe was soon hard at work to get matter ready for the American mail, and had to make up for the very enjoyable day spent on the banks of one of the loveliest portions of Sydney Harbor, that I doubt if one in a thousand in this city has ever seen the spot, considering that the shores of this magnificent harbor have over eighteen hundred miles frontage, and cannot be seen in less than eight days solid travel, and the writer confesses that it was his first visit, and a surprise it was to him I can assure you.

Mr. Bud Atkinson is the managing director of Crystal Palace, Limited, at the present time, but Mr. J. D. Williams informs me that all the shareholders have signed for the transfer and merging into the greater J. D. Williams Amusement Co., Limited, and if such be the case then the paid-up capital of the Crystal Palace, Limited, being £50,000, it will no doubt be added to the capital of the Greater J. D. W. A. Co., Ltd., and thus it will be raised to £250,000 in place of £200,000, as it stands at present, with the shares at 5 shillings a share premium on the Sydney Stock Exchange. Mr. Williams at the same time informs me that he has many new ventures in hand, and that he has just signed contracts for a white city in Melbourne on the famous St. Kilda Beach, where many, many thousands go to premenade—and bathe during the summer months especially, but to promenade the year round. He also informs me that he has brought out Mr. Cooper, of Chicago, to build two large motordromes, and there are many, many things that I will enlighten your readers on very shortly, but I hope and pray that all these things will not be the cause of a slump in all kinds of amusements on this side of the world, but more in my next will keep the people wondering what is coming next from the antipodes.

MILTON H. FAHRNEY

Director of the Nestor Western Company

One of the most successful motion picture directors is Milton H. Fahrney, who has been conected with the Nestor Film Company since its very inception, and has produced more than one hundred and fifty distinctive successes. Mr. Fahrney, though young in years, is old in experience, and is probably the nonpareil director of Western pictures. Besides doing director work, he writes his own scenarios and has the distinction of having written every scenario for all Nestor Westerns produced to date.

Miss Alexandra Phillips, who for two years was leading woman with the Nestor Film Company, collaborates with Mr. Fahrney in writing and editing Western scenarios.

Mr. Fahrney is a man who has done many things. When almost a lad he "soldiered" in western Canada, was with Broadwater, McColough & Co., cattle kings of the West, in Assiniboia, serving in the capacity of a cowpuncher. In China and Japan he served for the American government in connection with the topography department. In addition to having acted as manager in the following theatres: Garrick, Chicago; Pike, Cincinnati; the Salt Lake City Stock; Stock in Denver; he was on the road with Louis James and James O'Neil, and managed, besides, a company of his own through the West.

In a recent interview, speaking of the director's life at a moving picture studio, the concrete work, etc., Mr. Fahrney said: "We have to give ourselves heart and body and soul to our work, in order to make it a success. We have no time left for family or anything else. Just how hard we do work no one knows but ourselves and God—and still I am fascinated by the work. It was so the first day I entered a studio—I felt I never wanted to leave it again.

"Sometimes I want to say nasty things," he continued, "but I just don't do it. The actor is in most cases trying to do his best, and if you get out of patience and lose your temper, it only makes him self-conscious, and you don't get good results."

JOSEPH HOPP—CHICAGO

The sterling qualities, the personal worth, the aggressive spirit of "doing things" that wins the commendation and hearty approval of all admirers of the "Get-there" motto is well exemplified in the genial and affable Joseph Hopp, owner of the Standard Film Exchange at Chicago. Starting in the film rental business at a time when it was still in its crudity, his quick rise to a position of distinction and fame has deservedly placed him in the front ranks of "The Men Worth While." With keen perception, enterprising initiative and an almost unerring judgment, Mr. Hopp has proved the masterly mind and directing hand in achieving business success. He has done much towards bringing the film renting division of the motion picture business out of its early crude state, cleverly converting and systematizing the service to a superiority that gained for him a prominence so widespread that his creations have been extensively copied and adopted, and for some time past he has been recognized as a criterion on, and an originator of, all that is good in the film renting business. Of an ingenuous mind, genial nature, cheerful disposition and candid, sincere heart, one becomes immediately impressed by a feeling of comradehip when in his presence, and theee popular traits, with a democratic simplicity, have brought him a never-ready welcome from friends and acquaintances, who extend to him the hand of good fellowship with cordial good wishes.

NICHOLAS NICKLEBY

The work of the Thanhouser Company in reproducing and elucidating by means of the moving picture films many of the great works of literature and drama is worthy of more than a passing notice. Already their "David Copperfield" has found a place in many educational institutions throughout the country, and they have unwittingly, it may be, given inspiration to many to replenish and refresh their store of literary and dramatic knowledge.

A few days ago an interesting case was cited to me which will serve well to illustrate the point. A young man told of how his father and mother, being religiously inclined, were in the habit of severely denouncing the theatre. "However," said he, "since the moving picture has come in vogue they have taken a strong liking to this form of amusement, and now my mother calls regularly at the store every afternoon, about an hour before dinner, and she and my father go to the picture show.

"Lately," he continued, "the exhibitors have been advertising ahead the dates and titles of the pictures that are coming, and one day when I came home I found my mother quietly rummaging in the bookcase. I asked her what she was looking for and she said that she was looking up her Shakespeare. Said she, 'I am going to see "The Tempest" at the moving picture show, and I feel that I must brush up on it before I go.'"

It will be remembered that Thanhouser was the originator of this film, and now he is offering to the public another wonderful production, "Nicholas Nickleby," one of the Dickens masterpieces.

The dramatizing and the working out in pictures of this touching story by the Thanhouser Company is simply splendid. The marvel is, where did they find the appropriate settings outside of England?

To tell the story of "Nicholas Nickleby" here would be superfluous, for is not every single literary effort of Dickens a household picture? 'Tis surely sufficient to say that the characters are as Dickens' people always will be, unique, and original, and extreme in type, and that the sentiment, and atmosphere and individual personality has been studied, cherished and maintained by Edwin Thanhouser and his splendid company of actors and actresses in such a manner as to leave but little room for criticism.

This production will no doubt be perpetuated, and form for an indefinite number of years a supplement to the text-books of English literature.

THE CALL OF A WOMAN

Great Northern Special Feature Film Co.

(In Three Reels)

Somehow, Owen Brown didn't seem really to belong to the gang in Mag's place—a hangout for thieves and drunkards. He could drink longer than most, fight longer than all, and was a leader in all the devilment that was hatched in the basement den over which Mag (who never seemed to have any other name) presided, but even his best friends voted him queer.

He had funny ideas about cheating, for instance, and the man who used cogged dice or who had a penchant for pushing off aces up his sleeve, was helped out of Mag's, if Owen caught him, with a pleasant indifference as to whether he landed on the sidewalk, on his heels or on his head, and his unheard-of action in making one of the gang—"Lefty" Hoyle—give up the money he had stolen from "Peg" Hollran was the talk for weeks. Who could ask a finer chance than stealing money from a one-legged man who couldn't run after it?

Probably, in the course of time, Owen would have lost his queer ideals, would have drowned them in the vile fluid that Mag served as whiskey, for the fever of the drunkard was in his blood, and cried hungrily for the potent potion; but Annie Bell came into his life, and all things were changed. Owen had gone to the park with "Red" Burke and "Hinges" Doyle. There were no "pickings" to be found in the park, but the spring air was soft and pleasant, and it wasn't bad fun making remarks about the women who passed. Hanging around Mag's did not conduce to a high opinion of women.

Already the game had grown tiresome to Owen, when Annie came quickly down the walk. The books under her arm proclaimed her a school teacher, and Hinges had regarded teachers as his mutual enemies ever since the days his good old mother had sought to help out the truancy officer with a stout stick. Hinges rose, with a profound bow, and a speech that Owen didn't like. He looked to see her hurry on, but she stopped, and her finely cut lips curled in scorn as she surveyed her three tormentors. "And you call yourselves men?" she asked. Red and Hinges laughed. It was not often their victims answered, and they pressed on after the girl, in the hope of provoking her to further retort, but the speech cut Owen's dormant pride, and he followed the others, catching up with them just as Hinges caught the girl about the waist.

This was too much, and, with a shout, Owen was upon them, thrusting the men back, and stopping to pick up the girl's fallen books. "I'll go on a way with you" he offered, awkwardly. "Those guys don't know when they've had enough—unless it's from me." Mechanically she set her pace to his, still burning with indignation, and yet too close to tears to speak her thanks. It was not until they had reached the door that she found her voice.

"You will come and let me thank you?" she asked. "Tomorrow afternoon? It was very good of you. Will you come?" Owen bent and kissed the tiny hand she held out to him, in rude imitation of the men he had seen in the theatre. "Will I come?" he repeated. "Lady, a cop couldn't keep me away."

With a smile she was gone; but a new world had opened to Owen. It was the first time a decent woman had ever spoken to him as an equal, and his head was in a whirl as he turned away. He resolved that he would not only go, but that he would go sober. That afternoon was the first of many. Annie declared that he must not come in such a shabby suit, and pressed into his hand the money that was to buy new clothes. More than once one of the girls at Mag's had "staked" Owen, but this was different. He had taken it only as a loan, after she had put it that way, and for the first time that he could remember he wanted to earn money for some other purpose than to buy whiskey with. Not even when he met the gang did he break faith, but pushed on and sought the clothing shop, and felt well repaid for his denial by Annie's delight in the change. He could not even read the big type in the extras, and she insisted that he become her pupil.

It was not easy to learn to handle the pen, but with her soft fingers guiding his clumsy digits, "pot hooks," he succeeds, much to Annie's delight. Owen settles down to work, and he had conquered his craving for liquor. For a year he fought a splendid fight, for fame and victory was near.

He is overcome with the heat and staggered and fell, and, fortunately, Annie was the first to assist him in being removed by the ambulance to the hospital. Annie watched beside his bedside all night; he is left alone one day and sipped a glass of wine which brought back the old flame and longing for Mag's. He escapes and goes back to the past, and meeting Annie there, casts her aside, and she leaves the den heartbroken without him. Six months later, he sees an advertisement on a park bench for the best novel, prize to be $10,000. He decides to try. He writes his life's story of the past six months, was awarded the prize, and at a dinner which crowned his fame, as he is making a speech, his mind gives way, and he leaves the banquet as a crazy man.

He is again taken sick and brought to the hospital. Annie watches over him, softly calling his name. He regains consciousness. Annie clasps him in her arms and says, "Owen, it was my call—the call of a woman."

A BAD INVESTMENT?

American Film Mfg. Co. Release, Thursday, March 14th

When Jack Collins discovered that he loved Maud Brooks in his usual impetuous fashion he asked her to be his wife and she agreed. But when he told his father, the old gentleman refused to give him any assistance whatever in a financial way. When he informs Maud of his father's decision he is very much piqued when she agrees with the old gentleman.

Jack returns to his father and announces his intention of making his own way and to this proposition the old gentleman heartily agrees, and shows his appreciation by giving his son a check for $3,000 as a start. Before his son leaves home, however, he advises him strongly against investing in mining stock, for as a speculator himself he has learned several bitter lessons. Jack bids his sweetheart and father good-bye and heads for the glorious West. Here he impresses the miners and cowboys around the saloon by his prodigality, lighting his cigars with $5 bills, etc., and it soon reaches the ears of a mining sharp. He continues to meet the Easterner and takes him to an old abandoned sluice mine and manages to sell it to him for two-thirds of his capital. Jack immediately hires miners and then sits down and waits for the gold to come. The miners in the plot with the sharper work until they have earned his remaining $1,000 and then the foreman informs him that the mine is worthless. Jack immediately wires his father for help, telling him of the investment. His father's reply is characteristic of the man:

Serves you right for dabbling in mines. Nothing doing.
Father.

But the father's own telegram gave Jack the idea that worked his father's undoing. He hunts up the mining sharp and hires him to go in and sell his father stock in the mine in which he invested. With a faked list of prominent investors to show the old speculator the sharp succeeds beyond his wildest expectations, unloading on the old gentleman $10,000 worth of stock in Jack's $2,500 venture. Returning to Jack he gives him a certified check. and Jack pays him well for his services. A few days later Jack returns home and greets his father. He informs him he has purchased the same plant that Jack himself fell for and the old man is forced to admit his son's cleverness. Which he does to Jack's happy sweetheart by introducing his son as his private secretary.

SCENES FROM "IRELAND AND ISRAEL" (CHAMPION)

IRELAND AND ISRAEL

Champion

In "Ireland and Israel" the Champion Film Company has produced a story of originality that is quite a relief from the stereotyped plots that have been made to do duty since the inception of moving pictures.

It is refreshing in that comedy situations are interspersed throughout to relieve the tension. It is a film tale, typical of America, with the locale in New York, and illustrates how a bond of sympathy can be created by two foreign-bred residents who meet on a common level and discover in each other estimable traits of character, forgetting racial prejudice.

Abie, a young Israelite, descends the gang plank, a stranger in a strange land, and obtains his first view of the land of the free. His garb and general appearance indicates that he is what is known in slang parlance as a "mark." He is immediately surrounded by a tough gang and is an object of ridicule. He is in terror and shrinks away but his tormenters follow him. Pat Riley, a pugilist, appears on the scene, takes in the situation, and wades into the crowd, which disperses instanter.

Abie is grateful and cannot find words to thank his newly found friend. Pat is interested and Abie is invited to the home of the big-hearted Irishman. They become fast friends, this strangely assorted pair. Abie becomes interested in boxing, visits a gymnasium and becomes proficient in the art of attack and defense with nature's weapons. He re-visits the wharf and has the proud satisfaction of whipping the bully.

Pat is champion in his class and is matched to fight an aspirant for the honor. Abie is intensely interested and is on hand the night of the boxing entertainment. One of the boxers carded to appear in the preliminary flunks at the last moment and Abie takes his place. He is no match for the trained athlete and, thinking discretion the better part of valor, jumps over the ropes and acknowledges defeat. In the windup Pat is dethroned as the champion and a new idol is proclaimed. His erstwhile sporting confreres—friends in prosperity—desert him and he has only one friend—the faithful Abie, who comforts him with consoling words and tenderly assists him from the arena.

Their paths diverge. Pat, the dethroned pugilist, has squandered his ring earnings, is disheartened and cannot find work. He is reduced to abject poverty and his family suffers. To make matters worse he contracts disease and becomes a burden on his wife.

Abie, possessed of habits of thrift and keen business acumen, prospers and he becomes the head of a large real estate firm. Things go from bad to worse with Pat. As he lies in bed an officer comes with dispossess papers and he is ordered to vacate. The wife takes the papers to the agent of whom they rent and there finds Abie. Her story is soon told. The Israelite goes with her to her home and, unknown to Pat, takes in the situation. He leaves to return laden with provisions. Pat is sleeping and Abie hides. The unfortunate man is awakened and sees the well-supplied larder, takes the money from his wife, wondering what ministering angel has visited them. Abie comes to him with outstretched hand and the troubles of Pat are over.

The poor emigrant becomes the benefactor, and the bread cast upon the waters is returned the proverbial ten fold—a satisfactory finale of a beautifully story, told in a convincing way.

The scenes in the gymnasium and the prize ring are elaborately staged and Tom Sharkey, once an aspirant for heavyweight championship honors ,referees the bouts, and is master of ceremonies. It is Mr. Sharkey's initial pose before a moving picture camera and the story will be of much interest to those who are interested in sporting matters.

FROM OUR WESTERN CORRESPONDENT

Hot Springs, Ark., Feb. 20.—As my "better half" is filled with the enthusiasm that naturally is part of a Press Club banquet, it has developed upon me to provide the weekly review. The local newspaper men have organized the first Press Club in the State of Arkansas and my "hubby" has been honored by being elected president. I fear me much that I will not see him for many hours, and I'd hate to have a moving picture of him when he comes home. Also, I wonder what he will say when he sees this in print.

They are the guests this evening of the Park Hotel, one of the biggest and most palatial in the city, and when he left me a few moments ago, requesting that I write this week's letter I asked him when I could look for him and he said:

"From present indications, dear, the milkman and I will make you a call about one and the same time."

Our milkman, by the way, reaches the house when the first ray of dawn kisses the topmost branches of the old Ozarks.

But all this isn't moving picture news, is it? There was one thing of interest to the industry that took place during the week and that was the installing of a radium screen in the Photo Play Theatre, the first of its kind in the city. I had the pleasure of witnessing the first picture that was shown on the new curtain and the effect was excellent. The picture was the brightest of any that I have ever seen, and the management tells me that he is running with just about one-third the electric current that he formerly used. And who do you suppose dedicated the new screen? None other than the Thanhouser production of "Romeo and Juliet." There are certain features of those two reels that appealed to me, for I have played in the production, and there were other details that I did not like. Let's take the latter first. Romeo, you were not juvenile enough in your appearance. The lines showed, my gallant Romeo. And Paris, where oh where did you get the idea of that mustache. You are the first Paris I ever knew to wear one. I may be mistaken in this contention, but I think not. Fain would I have thee, Paris, go to that great city of thy name and study the classics, for even the French version, I think, will not feature that hairsuit (?) appendage. Look it up and let me know if I am right. That little sprite of talent, the Thanhouser kid, was much too melodramatic in the scene in which she appeared, and Friar Lawrence resembled a low comedian rather than the character Shakespeare would have him be. Juliet was dainty, pretty and talented. I liked her immensely; and God bless the dear old nurse! She is an artist. How quickly could one discover the indelible traits and training of "the old school," and it was a pleasure to watch her work. The scenic equipment left nothing to be desired.

There is one other motion picture lady to whom I desire to pass a compliment, and she is Miss Florence Lawrence, now with Lubin. I watched her work in "An American Girl" at the Lyceum Theatre the past week, and it was one of the most delightful parts I have seen her portray in many reels in which she has been featured here lately. Her work was a treat and I thank her kindly for coming back into her own.

That wonderful Vitagraph dog, Jean, was one of the chief attractions at the new Central Theatre during the week and when he "intervened" he furnished the merriest kind of a comedy, with just that touch of human interest that made one watch the picture from start to finish.

The Moose Lodge intend to have a gala time next Monday and Tuesday, when the moving pictures of the last convention of this order will be shown at the Photo Play Theatre. This house is located directly beneath the lodge rooms, and there are many Moose connected with the Photo Play. I understand from what the "Man in the Baths" tells me that part of the proceeds of the two days' receipts will go to their clubroom fund, hence the "boost" that these pictures are receiving.

It may be of interest to the hundreds and hundreds of pretty cashiers of moving picture shows throughout the United States to learn of the good fortune that has come to one of the city's prettiest little ladies, who formerly held the position of cashier at the Lyceum Theatre. She has been married about eight months. Previous to her matrimonial venture she was Miss Susie Kirk, daughter of William A. Kirk, a tailor. She was considered the prettiest and most stylishly dressed young lady in this resort of ever changing fashions. Her husband was a sign painter. He had been estranged from his father for the past ten years. Well, father's earthly career ended rather suddenly in Chicago this week, and her husband received a wire from his stepmother to hasten to that city, where there was a cool million dollars awaiting him. Think of it, girls,—a cool million! He could not believe it was true, for the reason that there was so much animosity between him and his father that he did not think the old gentleman would even leave him his regards. But it's true, just the same, and the little lady is now on her way to Chicago, accompanied by her husband, to share in his good fortune. Whether or not there is a suggestion in this that pretty cashiers of moving picture shows "set their cap" for painters I would not say.

"The Female Policemen" furnished all manner of fun for the patrons of the new Central Theatre the past week, and Lubin turned out a most excellent comedy. I do not know how it pleased my suffragette sisters, but I cannot imagine that they were overjoyed at seeing it. Personally, believe me, I enjoyed it, possibly because I have no sympathy with th suffragette cause.

There was one thing I noted in the moving pictures the past week and that was the handsome gowns worn by the ladies in those scenes that called for ballroom regalia. Some of the dresses were magnificent and elicited no end of favorable comment. It is a pleasure to realize that the producers are not "stingy" in this respect, for it is such an easy matter to spoil a good picture by not having the characters dress the part in keeping with the subject. Also, I observed that several men and women in the pictures, when it became necessary to write letters, would dash a pen in a frenzied manner across the paper, some drawing a straight line and another giving a very poor imitation of penmanship, yet, presto! the nicest kind of a letter would be the result. Ladies and gentlemen, when you are called upon to write letters, please write 'em, won't you? THE LADY IN THE BATHS.

ANOTHER THANHOUSER AIRSHIP STORY

Thanhouser Company must like airships! They're announcing another skycraft story; this one by their Florida stock company. A merchant dies, leaving a lot of money, and decrees in his will that his daughter must wed by a certain date his young business partner. In this the father had his daughter's best interests strictly at heart, and she had no objection since the young partner was altogether a model young man.

But there was objection, nevertheless, from a scheming aunt. She knows that if the girl can be prevented from marrying the young man before the date set in the will the fortune reverts to herself, under the terms specified in the document. And to make the marriage impossible, she keeps the girl practically prisoner on a lonely island. However, the young man learns everything and gets to the island just in time to rescue his lady love. How? Well, that's where the airship came in. He literally flew to fortune! Hence the picture has been called "Flying to Fortune" and is found on the Thanhouser release schedule for Tuesday, March 12th.

CHICAGO LETTER

During a visit to the Oak Theatre at 2004 North Western avenue, corner of Armitage, I was shown, through the courtesy of the secretary-treasurer of Local No. 2, Mr. Hal Johnston, who is in charge of the operators here, a new device which Mr. Johnston states fills a long-left want to the operators. It consists of an instrument whereby the operator can set his star and shutter gears perfectly, thereby doing away with the bad focus, streaky and hazy pictures, which is the cause of improper adjustment of the intermittent and shutter gear. Many operators, to remedy this trouble, have to send their machine to repair shops to have their intermittent gear adjusted, and usually pay four or five dollars for this work. The device that Mr. Johnston uses is fast becoming popular all over Chicago, as it is sold for a very small sum of $1.00.

The well-known and popular Mr. Fred McMillan has returned to this city after a phenomenal business trip throughout Wisconsin. He states that business is booming in that state as the weather is improving and is bringing the people out of doors. Mr. McMillan is very enthusiastic and well pleased with the business of the Theatre Supply Company at the present time. Business is increasing with such great strides that by the first of May new and larger offices will be leased.

The commercial service furnished at this exchange can be well spoken of as it is Mr. McMillan's endeavor to give entire satisfaction to all exhibitors who patronize him, as he has secured a number of the best feature films and has placed orders with all the leading manufacturers for their features that will be released in the future.

I visited the Ellis Theatre, on Sixty-third street and Ellis avenue, one night last week and there saw, for the first time, one of "Reid's Diffusers" in operation. The effect produced is restful and pleasant and is equal to that produced by the double dissolver. The operator informed me that the diffuser was so simple and easy to handle that it was a pleasure to use one and in the future he would never be without one. The Ellis Theatre is owned by the Louise Amusement Company. It has a seating capacity of 509. Four acts of good vaudeville and two reels of Independent pictures are on the evening's program under the able management of Mr. Hobson, and the Ellis does a capacity business, rain or shine.

Moving pictures illustrating the scenic beauties along the route of the Northern Pacific Railroad were shown before an audience of about 1,800 scholars and teachers of the St. James High School, Wednesday evening, February 14th.

Mr. Watterson R. Rothacker has returned from Denver, Col., where he gave a lecture on moving picture advertising before a number of Denver advertising men.

Much comment has been made over a proposed amendment to Sec. 119 of the Chicago code for 1911, which if passed will prohibit children under sixteen years of age attending public performances, picture theatres and other places of amusement, unless accompanied by a parent or guardian. This amendment was to have gone before the City Council, Monday, February 19th, but has been withheld, and it is now thought will not be passed as the Censorship Board here is a very capable body of men who eliminate all the objectionable features in a picture and after it passes them any child can see the same and profit by it.

There has also been much discussion about a fee for permits issued at 50 cents apiece. So many of the exhibitors and exchange men are careless with permits and lose them easily, thereby making more work for the censorship board, that this fee is collected with the idea that in the future the above-named will be more careful with the same.

The following are the ordinances as amended governing the leasing, transferring, putting into circulation and exhibition of moving pictures passed by the City Council on January 29, 1912, and in force on and after February 20, 1912.

1625. Permit required to exhibit moving pictures. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to show or exhibit in a public place or in a place where the public is admitted anywhere in the city of Chicago any picture or series of pictures of the classes or kinds commonly shown in mutoscopes, kinetoscopes, cinematographs, and such pictures or series of pictures as are commonly shown or exhibited in so-called penny arcades, and in all other automatic or moving picture devices, whether an admission fee is charged or not, without first having secured a permit therefor from the general superintendent of police of the city of Chicago.

1626. Application for permit. Before any such permit is granted, an application in writing shall be made therefor, and the plates, films, rolls or other like apparatus by or from which such picture or series of pictures are shown or produced, or the picture or series of pictures itself as shown or exhibited, shall be shown to the general superintendent of police, who shall inspect, or cause to be inspected, such plates, films, rolls or apparatus or such picture or series of pictures, and within three days after such inspection he shall either grant or deny the permit. In case a permit is granted it shall be in writing and in such form as the general superintendent of police may prescribe.

Amending Sections 1627, 1628 and 1629 of the Chicago Code of 1911

Be it ordained by the City Council of the City of Chicago:

Section 1. That Sections 1627, 1628 and 1629 of The Chicago Code of 1911 be and the same are hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"1627.—Immoral Pictures—Permits Not to Be Granted—Appeal to Mayor. If a picture or a series of pictures for the showing or exhibition of which an application for a permit is made is immoral or obscene, it shall be the duty of the General Superintendent of Police to refuse such permit, otherwise it shall be his duty to grant such permit.

In case the General Superintendent of Police shall refuse to grant a permit as hereinbefore provided the applicant for same may appeal to the Mayor; such appeal shall be presented in the same manner as the original application to the General Superintendent of Police. The action of the Mayor on any application for a permit shall be final."

"1628.—No Transfer of Objectionable Films—Confiscation—Penalty. In case a permit shall be refused for any such moving picture plates, films, rolls or other like articles or apparatus from which a series of pictures for public exhibition can be produced, it shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to lease or transfer the same to any exhibitor of moving pictures or otherwise put same into circulation for purposes of exhibition within the city.

In every case where such objectionable moving picture plates, films, rolls or other like articles or apparatus from which a series of pictures for public exhibition can be produced shall be put into circulation contrary to the provisions of this section the same shall be confiscated, and in addition thereto the person, firm or corporation so leasing, transferring or putting the same into circulation shall be fined not less than fifty dollars nor more than two hundred dollars for each offense."

"1629.—Fee for Permit. The permit herein provided for shall be obtained for each and every picture or series of pictures exhibited, and shall be required in addition to any license or other imposition now required by law or ordinance.

"The fee for each of such permits shall be fifty cents and shall be paid to the City Collector before same shall be issued."

Section 2. This ordinance shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage and due publication.

THE CLOSED BIBLE

Majestic Release, March 10th

Driven to desperate expedients by the necessity of providing adequate food and shelter for his wife and babe, John Manners is tempted to avail himself of the opportunity an open window affords.

Inside the room another man, equally desperate, but from far different causes, has just grimly taken down his old family Bible, and unsmilingly reads the old record of his birth, the date of his marriage, the birth of his now five-year-old son, the death of his wife, a year before, and then, with a hard smile, calmly writes his intention to join his wife in the great beyond.

Manners barely makes his stealthy entrance into the room when he is startled by a pistol shot and unconsciously he rushes forward and catches the falling body of the owner of the house, Randolph Werner, in his arms.

A policeman has followed Manners through the window, and he is placed under arrest and later convicted of manslaughter by the district attorney, and sentenced to twenty years imprisonment.

His wife, overcome by the shock, drops dead in the court room when hearing the sentence, and Manners is led away, swearing vengeance upon the officials of the law, and especially the district attorney, who have sentenced him upon circumstantial evidence.

The year-old babe of the dead woman claims the interest and sympathy of the court, and the district attorney takes the child to his home. His wife's heart goes out to the innocent sufferer, and they adopt the baby, determining never to tell her of her sad parentage, but rear her as their own daughter.

Nearly twenty years pass; slowly for the innocent man behind gray walls, but swiftly for the little girl, who is the pet and pride of the now aged district attorney, and equally swiftly for the boy left fatherless at five.

Fate throws this boy, Randolph Werner, Jr., across the path of the girl, and during her adopted father's absence from home a love affair soon matures, and the happy girl presents young Randolph to her father as a suitor for her hand.

The district attorney of twenty years back, now Judge Karthy, at once remembers the boy's father, and refuses his consent to the marriage. He refuses to explain to the girl, but tells the boy that he may not marry Mabel because, twenty years before, he convicted her father of murdering the boy's father.

Young Werner realizes the horror of the situation, and also the wisdom of keeping Mabel in ignorance that she is an adopted daughter, and resolves to give her up, but love is too strong, and a week later the judge reads with sinking heart a note from Mabel that, as he had given her no good reason for not marrying Werner, she had eloped.

That very day the prison doors opened and released her father—his sentence over, and with a twenty-year thirst for vengeance, John Manners has run down the district attorney that convicted him.

At the moment Judge Karthy is facing death at the hand of the father, the daughter is inscribing her name on the old dusty Bible of the Werner family, which has not been opened for twenty years. As her husband turns the pages idly, past births, marriages and deaths, he comes across the entry made by his father at the moment of death.

That old entry means freedom to his bride's father, means that she may learn without shame of her father's sad story, and taking the "Book of Books" with them, they fly to the judge's home, and arrive in the nick of time to save two lives and themselves a lifetime of regrets.

THE UNWILLING BIGAMIST

Majestic Release, March 12th

Nature, like history, sometimes repeats itself. It did so in the instance of Walter Smith and William Jones, by making one the exact duplicate of the other. Neither knew one whit of the other's existence until a speeding automobile injures one of them so severely that he is landed in an emergency hospital.

Smith is the victim of the machine, by being knocked down on Market Street one morning, while walking leisurely to his office. The hospital officials fail to find anything on the man's person to establish his identity, and the morning newspapers run his picture the following day, at the head of an account of the accident, as the unidentified victim.

William Jones had left his home the morning of the accident, to take a train for Philadelphia, and his wife, seeing the picture of the unknown in a newspaper the morning following, immediately identifies it as that of her husband. She hastens to the emergency hospital, where she unhesitatingly declares the injured man to be her husband. Smith's injuries are slight. A bad wrench in the muscles of one leg and a painful bruise on the forehead are all that can be credited to the auto.

Smith emphatically disclaims any acquaintance whatever with the highly agitated woman. She attributes his failure to recognize her to a lapse of memory due to the bump on his head. In this she is supported by the house surgeon, who declares the patient's brain is mildly affected.

Confident the man is indeed her husband, Mrs. Jones carts him off to her home, in spite of Smith's vigorous protests. Here her fond solicitude and devoted attentions excite his disgust, and cause more suffering from mental torture than physical pain. He attempts to escape several times, but is always balked at every turn by McMillan, the burly nurse Mrs. Jones has employed to guard her beloved one from self harm.

In one of his efforts to communicate with his wife, a letter he bribes the house maid to deliver is intercepted by Mrs. Jones. On reading this letter she is convinced of the horrifying fact that her hitherto exemplary spouse is a bigamist. She immediately communicates by phone with Mrs. Smith, whom she firmly believes is wife number two.

Mrs. Smith, now a nervous wreck, is grateful to receive any kind of news, good or bad, of the missing one and hastens at once to Mrs. Jones' residence. There the highly outraged wives confront the innocent Smith, and score him unmercifully for his—to them—brazen duplicity.

"GOD DISPOSES."
Solax—Feb. 23.

Whether it be classed as melodrama or just strong drama—it hits, and hits hard. It is dramatic in plot, action and manner of presentation. It is well staged and shows fine photography. A young man marries an actress and loses his parental home and fortune thereby. Poverty is his lot and, after the birth of his child and her growth past the toddling period, in his desperation he turns burglar. The child, in play, removes the cartridges from her father's revolver, and so, when he later attempts to rob his own father and to shoot the latter, whom he does not recognize, the gun does not fire, and he is saved from a murderer's fate. It ends in a logical and pleasing manner.

RELEASED WEDNESDAY, MARCH 13th

The Boarding House Heiress

This picture is really a fifteen-minute rapid-fire vaudeville act. It is full of sharp, bright comedy situations and has a plot that affords many opportunities to Billy Quirk, Fannie Simpson and Lee Beggs. The story concerns the matrimonial aspirations of a superannuated miss with a fictitious fortune.

RELEASED FRIDAY, MARCH 15th

Falling Leaves

The pathos of this production worms its way to the heart and gently touches the heart strings like the little girl in this story, who gently strings up the falling autumn leaves, with the innocent belief that it will prevent her sister from dying of the "white plague." All the gentler emotions of gentle and emotional people going through a crisis are visualized on the screen with convincing realism.

A BAD INVESTMENT

American Release, March 11th

When Jack Collins discovered that he loved Maud Brooks, in his usual impetuous fashion, he asked her to be his wife, and she agreed. But when he told his father, the old gentleman refused to give him any assistance whatever in a financial way. When he informs Maud of his father's decision, he is very much piqued when she agrees with the old gentleman.

Jack returns to his father and announces his intention of making his own way, and to this proposition the old gentleman heartily agrees, and shows his appreciation by giving his son a check for $3,000, as a start. Before his son leaves home, however, he advises him strongly against investing in mining stock, for, as a speculator himself, he has learned several bitter lessons. Jack bids his sweetheart and father good-bye, and heads for the glorious West. Here he impresses the miners and cowboys around the saloon by his prodigality, lighting his cigars with $5 bills, etc., and it soon reaches the ears of a mining sharp. He continues to meet the Easterner, and takes him to an old abandoned sluice mine, and manages to sell it to him for two-thirds of his capital. Jack immediately hires miners, and then sits down and waits for the gold to come. The miners, in the plot with the sharper, work until they have earned his remaining $1,000, and then the foreman informs him that the mine is worthless. Jack impulsively wires his father for help telling him of the investment. His father's reply is characteristic of the man:

"Serves you right for dabbling in mines. Nothing doing. Father."

But the father's own telegram gave Jack the idea that worked his father's undoing. He hunts up the mining sharp, and hires him to go in and sell his father stock in the mine in which he invested. With a faked list of prominent investors to show the old speculator, the sharp succeeds beyond his mildest expectations, unloading on the old gentleman $10,000 worth of stock in Jack's $2,500 venture. Returning to Jack he gives him a certified check and Jack pays him well for his services. A few days later Jack returns home and greets his father. He informs him he has purchased the same plant that Jack himself fell for, and the old man is forced to admit his son's cleverness which he does to Jack's happy sweetheart by introducing his son as his private secretary.

AFTER SCHOOL

After the death of their mother, Jane Terrell agrees to stay home and do the housework, while her little sister Bessie attends school.

When the new schoolmaster arrives, he comes to their home to board, and admiring Jane's kindness, determines to give her lessons at home. Both girls learn to admire, and then to love the handsome teacher, and when Bessie sees that his evenings are all given to Jane she resents it, and confesses to her sister that she loves him.

Jane, rather than cause her sister unhappiness, again sacrifices herself, discontinues her lessons, and avoids the teacher. He is at a loss to understand her actions for he has become deeply interested in her, while he looks upon Bessie as an interesting child.

This was the condition when Jim Reeves, a salesman, stopped at the farm. Fascinated by Bessie's sweet personality, he obtains lodgings, and soon Bessie is more interested in him than she is in Jack Redmond, the teacher. Jane sees that her sister is spending more and more of her time with the handsome stranger, and warns her to be careful. Rebuffed by Bessie, she appeals to the salesman, and he ignores her.

And then one night Bessie runs away with him, leaving behind a note:

"I have gone away with him to the city. He says I can have lots of pretty clothes. Love. Bessie."

When the father discovers that Bessie is gone his wrath is terrible, and he forbids her name to be spoken in his presence. Time drags its weary length on the farm, the father brooding over the wrong done his daughter, Jane trying to comfort and cheer him, and the schoolmaster attempting cheerfulness to soothe them both.

And then, one morning, Jane finds her little sister near the door, fearing to enter, utterly unhappy. She sobs out the miserable story in Jane's comforting arms, of betrayal and desertion. Jack Redmond finds them, and when he learns the truth swears to track down the salesman and force him to make retribution.

Fearing the father's wrath, they conceal Bessie in the barn, and the schoolmaster hurries to the city. He finds the girl's betrayer, and asks him to come with him.

Reeves is defiant until Jack shows him that the suspicious-looking bulge in his pocket is a revolver trained on him, and he is forced to go with Jack to a Justice of the Peace. The three of them return to the farm, and, under the tree where Jim had met little Bessie the Justice performed the ceremony.

Then Jack tells him to be gone and never come back. But, with a newly-awakened manhood, he decides to live with the little girl of whose innocence he had taken advantage, and together they go to the father.

When Bessie shows him she is married the father forgives them, and takes Bessie back into his heart. And out under the tree another romance reaches its culmination, for Jack and Jane reach a perfect understanding at last.

THE BOARDING HOUSE HEIRESS

Solax Release, March 13th

Poor old maids! There are so many of them who would like to be married, and yet cruel men proposeth not. Some there are who propose themselves, when good old Leap Year comes around, and some there are who save up enough money with which to buy a man.

Old Betsey Older, in this production, lives in a boarding house, in which money-loving "Bud" Doolittle and wise Tom Dear are also unfortunate boarders. Poor Betsey loses her heart to both of these gentlemen.

Betsey tries hard to win the love of these gentlemen, but the harder she tries the less progress she makes. In fact, she gets so tangled up that before long she thinks she "sees things." This is really a vaudeville show in pictures. The "business" is the funniest thing yet.

Well, "Bud" and Tom try to stake her to each other, for they are both victims of Flirting Marian. Tom finally gets "Bud" to propose to Betsey, misleading him with a phantom legacy. "Bud" learns the truth of the heiress' real financial position, and then leaves her at the altar. Billy Quirk is a circus in himself, as "Bud" Doolittle.

FALLING LEAVES

Solax Release, March 15th

Children have intricate methods of reasoning. One might almost say that their minds are illogically logical. This may be a seeming paradox, but the person who will closely watch a child will discover that it seldom does anything without consulting a peculiar philosophy of its own.

Thus, in this Solax production, little Trixie Thompson (Magda Foy) concludes that the only way she could save her beautiful sister from dying of the "white plague" is by preventing the autumn leaves from falling. Little Trixie knows all this because she had heard her elders say that those troubled with weak lungs usually begin to suffer, and probably die, when the leaves begin to fall.

Winifred, Trixie's older sister, is on the verge of contracting tuberculosis. The little girl loves her sister too much to let her die, so one night she steals into the garden in her "nightie," and fastens the fallen leaves with twine, and hangs them up on the trees. Trixie keeps a rigid vigil for months, and all the leaves that fall in the garden are replaced on the trees.

While Trixie busied herself with this metaphorical occupation, Dr. Earl Headley, a young lung specialist, discovers a serum which cures consumption. He is called in by the Thompsons, and Winifred is soon brought back to health. The doctor not only restores her lungs, but takes her heart. Little Trixie then permits the leaves to fall.

Mace Greenleaf plays Dr. Earl Headley, a specialist. Blanche Cornwall plays Mrs. Griswold Thompson. Marion Swayne plays Miss Winifred Thompson. The Solax Kid plays Little Trixie. Darwin Karr plays Mr. Griswold Thompson.

MATERNITY

Gaumont Release, March 16th

There are mothers and mothers, as this film impresses upon us. Some devote their lives to their children and strive and struggle to give their offspring the utmost advantages within their possibilities, while others pursue a selfish, unmaternal course of pleasure and leisure, unmindful of the duties they owe the little one whose life on earth they are responsible for. Joan, a peasant, is left in miserable poverty with a six months' old child, the very heart of her life, upon an attack of a lingering malady to her husband. Circumstances compel her separation from the child she so cherishes and idolizes. She becomes a nurse to the young baby of a fashionable couple. The comparison of her own child to the ward palls her more and more, as time goes on, and causes her deep melancholy. So indifferent is her

JIMMIE, TEMPERANCE REFORMER

Gaumont Release, March 19th

The family of ragpickers, of which Jimmie is the oldest son, is really a very happy group of individuals. The only beclouding circumstance is the regular Saturday spree of the father. At these times, the parent is entirely changed, and is just as abusive as he is fond and indulgent when sober. Jimmie does his best to straighten up this one big fault—first, by entreaty, and then by the clever ruse of pretending to be intoxicated one Friday. The father is horror-stricken at the conduct of his son, and goes to reprimand him, when the son reveals his soberness and succeeds in shaming his father into abstinence on Saturdays. Papa behaves all day, but on Sunday develops an irresistible thirst. and breaks into a run for the closest saloon, only to be restrained by Jimmie, the temperance reformer, again —this time by the "saturated with water" cure.

AN OLD ROMANCE

Gaumont Release, March 23d

Jeanne is ardently in love with Henry, an honorable, manly fellow, who is just as deeply in love with her.

Unfortunately, Jeanne's parents had arranged a match with a young man of higher social position, and of greater affluence. With heartfelt reluctance, the two lovers separate, supposedly forever. Jeanne and the parents' choice are married, and really enjoy a very happy life, except for the fact their young son is not robust and strong. An epidemic of croup grips the neighborhood and claims the little fellow as a victim. His parents wire at once for their specialist, who, owing to his inability to attend to the case, sends a young assistant in his place. To their mutual surprise, the physician turns out to be the former Henry, whom Jeanne had never quite forgotten. The husband watches his wife with increasing jealousy and fairly flies into a rage when he finds Henry offering his wife consolation about her child's illness in the form of an embrace. In spite of the fact that the child is pulled through, the husband is about to denounce his wife, when she presents correspondence that shows the sterling calibre of Henry, to the humiliation of Jeanne's husband. A hand shake of genuine appreciation between the two men follows.

ALCOHOL, OR THE POISON OF HUMANITY

Eclair Release, March 10

Morin, an honest workingman, is addicted to liquor. Practically speaking, he is never drunk, but the destructive poison is in his system, and has ruined his health. Sometimes, he experiences sudden fits of anger, without the slightest provocation, which are followed by a general depression. Truly, his wife is the one who suffers. The latter has brought up their son, Marcel, gifted with a remarkable intelligence, who very soon becomes an able engineer. His employer takes an interest in him, and gradually he advances himself to a responsible position in the manufacturing plant where he is employed.

While testing out a new machine, modified under his supervision, Marcel Morin is congratulated by all the engineers, and Suzanne, the employer's daughter, heartily congratulates him. A few days afterward the young couple meet in the garden. Plainly embarrassed, Marcel presents her a flower and goes away, without having the courage to speak to her about his affection. It is the beginning of their romance. Suzanne is fond of the young man, who is industrious and serious. But her father seems to apprehend their intimate feelings toward each other, and knowing that the young man's father is addicted to liquor, does not favor a possible alliance between the two. To end their love affair, he decides to send the young man away, hoping that by doing so he may succeed in estranging them. In other words, he thinks he desires the young lovers to forget each other.

Marcel is, therefore, despatched to Chili on a mission demanding his immediate departure. The elder Morin is overjoyed at the news of his son's promotion to a high place, but the young man is heartbroken The old man cannot account for the boy's depression, and is seized by one of his fits of rage, and is about to strike his son. Becoming calm again, the poor old man cannot understand his act of mental aberration. After a touching farewell between the young lovers, Marcel leaves for Chili, his father and mother accompanying him to the R. R. station. On their way home, both very depressed, the elder Morin does not hesitate to drown his sorrows at the bar, while his good wife waits without. In an altercation over a game of cards, he is again seized by one of his fits, and is sent to his home in an ambulance, where he slowly recovers, after careful nursing. But, gradually the old workingman falls back into his bad habits; he continues drinking again and can arouse no energy unless he imbibes his favorite glass of brandy, which his wife fears to give him, as the doctor has ordered the strictest abstinence to preserve his life.

In the meantime, the younger Morin has completed his task in Chili, and returns home, after a lapse of three years. Marcel is thinking about his sweetheart and finally induces her father to consent to their marriage, when he realizes how successful the boy's career has already been.

The very night of the nuptials, the elder Morin is stricken with an attack of apoplexy and is taken home. Owing to the good care given him, the wretched creature is saved from death, but is left a helpless paralytic.

Nothing has yet intervened to mar the happiness of Marcel and his lovely bride who love each other devotedly. But, alas! The terrible hereditary influence commences its work of destruction in the mind of Marcel. He is frequently seized by sudden attacks of anger without any reason. At the factory he abuses the workmen for no cause. In his hallucinations, he sees his young wife in the arms of another, is seized by jealous forebodings. One day, while a prey to these thoughts, he hurries home and finds his wife conversing quite innocently with his close friend. An insane desire to kill takes possession of him, and, without hesitation, he takes out his revolver and shoots Suzanne, who lingers for weeks at the very door of death while Marcel languishes in prison until the day of his trial.

Meanwhile, Marcel's mother has engaged an attorney to defend her boy. On his first visit to the house, he notices the old Morin, paralyzed and practically a helpless invalid, and hears the wife's story of his past. The truth awakens in his mind. He places a bottle of brandy before the eyes of the old man and by the burning desire which he perceives in the eyes of the old man, he realizes that the son is a victim of heredity.

The day of the trial arrives. Suzanne, now recovered, goes to Court to implore the pardon of her unfortunate husband, whom she still loves. Nothing is more impressive than this woman, dressed all in black, imploring the gentlemen of the jury to spare a son to his father.

Seated in the prisoner's box, the accused is grief-stricken, and sobs aloud while his lawyer points out the sins of the father, and pleads for the liberty of his unfortunate client.

He waxes eloquent, as he unfolds the various phases in the life of the elder Morin showing the progress of the terrible demon, alcohol, as it eats into the vitals of body and mind.

With an emotion which impresses the audience, he designates the tottering wreck Morin, who is altogether indifferent while witnessing this scene, where the life of a son is at stake.

The jury retires for a debate. Acquittal seems certain, but the strain has been too much for the weakened system of Marcel; who, crushed by his anguish, and between the arms of his despairing wife and heartbroken mother, dies an innocent victim to the fatal passion of his father, who stupidly looks on and grins.

The dramatic importance of this production is very great. It is interpreted vividly and forcibly by real artists.

"FLYING TO FORTUNE"

Thanhouser Release, March 12

A wealthy old man, who has been a semi-invalid for years, is informed by his physician that his case is hopeless, and that death is only a matter of a few months. The invalid decides to put "his house in order," but is worried as to the future of the business that has won his fortune. Therefore, it is a matter of gratification to him when he sees that his only daughter and the young partner in whom he implicitly relies seem to be mutually attracted. The partner is called to Europe just before the doctor gives his verdict, but the invalid makes "everything all right" in his will. At least, he believes so. He provides that the bulk of his estate shall go to the girl, if she marries the partner within one year from the hour of her father's death. Should she fail to comply, the property reverts to her father's sister.

This unique document pleases the girl, and the partner is willing to carry the provision into effect, for he loves her. In fact, had it not been for the aunt, the entire affair would have been commonplace.

The elder woman was jealous, however, and, aided and advised by a dishonest lawyer, who was in love with her, she plotted to win the fortune for herself. The girl's marriage was set for the last day of the year of grace. The afternoon before, she is spirited away by a ruse, and held prisoner on an island, owned by the aunt, the lawyer acting as jailer.

The bridegroom-to-be searches for her in vain, but does not get a clue to her whereabouts until the time is nearly up. In fact, he knows it will be impossible to bring her back in time to save the fortune. But what a boat cannot do, an airship can, and a gallant aeronaut sails to the island, and flies back with the bride, and has time to spare. The lawyer follows in an auto, but is easily outdistanced.

"THE POACHER"

Thanhouser Release, March 15

A rich old man owned an estate in the Adirondacks, where he spent most of his time. Having nothing of real importance to occupy his time, he devoted all his energies to hunting down poachers who would sometimes stealthily visit his estate. The theft of a rabbit would drive the old man into a frightful rage, while for an outsider to kill a deer he regarded as on the plane of high treason.

Therefore, it was with feelings of great joy that he greeted two keepers who had captured a man shooting game on the magnate's estate. The rich man was a magistrate, partially because he enjoyed sending persons to jail, and in this particular case he signed the commitment papers with great personal satisfaction.

It was a flimsy old country jail, and the prisoner managed to break out. Then he started through the woods, hoping to keep out of the way of his enemy.

There was only one person the magnate really loved, his little grandson. The boy had been present when the poacher had been arraigned, and had expressed sympathy for him. This child was accustomed to having his own way, and impressed by what he had heard, decided to be a poacher himself.

With his sturdy toy gun, he started out for an expedition in the woods all alone. He was lost, but finally found refuge in a cabin, where he sank exhausted, unable to go further.

There was no one in the shack to help him, as it was deserted and falling into decay, and the child would undoubtedly have perished of the cold had it not been for the arrival of the fugitive poacher.

The man was in a quandary. If he left the boy, the child would certainly perish from exposure. He needed care and medicine, and needed it at once. The nearest place of refuge was the home of the magnate, but to take him there meant that the poacher would be recaptured. In fact, his only chance to escape was to cover the greatest possible amount of ground in the shortest possible space of time.

It was a choice of liberty or humanity, and the poacher decided to sacrifice himself for the boy. He carried him through the woods, intending to leave him at the door of his home, and then escape if possible, but was pounced upon and captured just as he wearily toiled up the steps with his burden.

The keepers triumphantly produced him before the magnate and waited for words of praise, but the boy revived in time to make it clear that he owed his life to the man who was fleeing from the law. The magnate marked "Complaint dismissed" across the warrant, in the case where he was both accuser and judge, and told the prisoner that he would see that he had a fair chance to succeed in life.

"And I never thought I would place a poacher at the top of my list of friends," he added, "but I have."

"A TIMELY REPENTANCE"

Imp Release, March 11

A story in which a moving picture drama shows an erring wife the worth of a true man.

John Crawford, an honest mechanic, and Wilbur Robinson, a young man of leisure, both love the same girl. She marries Crawford and a baby comes to cheer their home. Crawford is engaged in perfecting an invention, and, pending the expected money, does not provide liberally for his family. The wife is dissatisfied, for she has been accustomed to having every wish gratified.

Robinson notes this fact, and lures away the wife of the mechanic. She goes with him, deserting the baby at home, leaving a note for her husband. They plan to leave the city, but while walking about awaiting the departure of a train, they happen to pass the doors of a moving picture theatre and Mrs. Crawford expresses a desire to go in. They enter, and the story thrown on the screen is identical with the experience which they are passing through.

The tempter enters the home of a poor man, and entices the woman away under promises of a life of luxury. The woman goes, taking her baby and leaving a letter for her husband. He returns, reads the cruel note and is distracted. In his despair he shoots himself.

Unable to witness the closing scenes, and filled with remorse, Mrs. Crawford begs Robinson to take her out in the open. Then and there she repudiates him, and, refusing to ride in an automobile, she hurries toward her humble home, hoping she may return before the husband.

She reaches the house, searches feverishly for the note, finds it, and destroys every vestige of her attempted perfidy. She finds the child sleeping peacefully, and takes it in her arms, overjoyed. The husband returns triumphant. He has disposed of his invention for a sum sufficient to make them rich. The wife takes him in her arms, delirious with joy and satisfaction, thanking her Maker that she has remained unsullied and has returned to her loved ones.

Shamus O'Brien is a figure in Irish poetry, dear to every son of Erin. The story of his heroism, capture and escape has been weaved into a thrilling, heart-gripping, powerful and beautiful photo-play.

Shamus O'Brien was a patriot and in fighting for his country places himself in the position of a rebel with a price on his head.

He is hiding in the hills, but anxious to attend a dance, at which his friends and sweetheart will be present, sends word that he will be there. Arrangements are made for the dance and Shamus surprises the guests by appearing in a surprising manner. Michael O'Farrel, who has not met with success in his suit for the hand of Aileen Brennan, the sweetheart of Shamus, learns of his whereabouts, and notifies the Redcoats. They reach the barn, where the dance is taking place, too late to capture the patriot, who escapes to the loft, only to return as the girl of his heart is being insulted by Captain McDonald. O'Brien floors the officer and makes a thrilling escape, only to be again given up by O'Farrel, when he is visiting his mother. He is then taken to prison and stands trial. He is convicted and the day of the execution set. As this draws near, his mother makes a plea to the parish priest for help, which is readily given and through a ruse Shamus is saved, and the picture closes as the mother, son

"PERCY LEARNS TO WALTZ"

Percy and Edith are sweethearts, and he escorts her to a ball, under the pretense of being a finished dancer. They arrive at the function, and to inspiring music they commence to waltz. But to Edith's dismay, she finds that she has been deceived, as Percy only succeeds in falling all over himself as well as the furniture, and lastly, to her mortification, he causes her to fall also. Edith then becomes indignant, and leaves the room, accompanied by another admirer. Percy is seized by the green-eyed monster, and rushes home alone.

Percy then decides he will learn to waltz, and makes life miserable for the boarders in the house, by making them dance with him. Finally the cook in the kitchen comes in for her share of the attention, and, much against her will, Percy tries a turn with her, in the end falling over the stove in his evolutions.

After great perseverance Percy acquires the art to perfection and attends another dance. Edith is there also, and he refuses to dance with her, devoting his time to the other girls present. Edith becomes very jealous, but after an amusing scene, Percy forgives her, and they spend the remainder of the evening enjoying the dances together and this time she does not refuse to allow him to accompany her home.

"HIDE AND SEEK"

Reliance Release, March 20

RELIANCE.

Jack Porter, the young operator at Midvale Station, sells out his country property during a land boom for the sum of ten thousand dollars. He requests the real estate agent in a neighboring town, who negotiates the deal, to have the money sent to him at once in cash, as he is involved in another business deal in which he must make a cash payment. The agent sends one of his trusted men, Clarkson, with the cash, to Porter's home. When Clarkson arrives at Midvale, Porter has gone home for his dinner, and he asks Smith, the express agent, to direct him. Smith, knowing of the estate deal, talks to Clarkson about it, and both men look at the money with envious eyes. Both men instinctively feel that their thoughts regarding that money are identical. "If it were only mine!" Clarkson finally leaves for Porter's house, where the money is delivered safely. After the money has left his hands Clarkson has an overpowering temptation to steal it. Smith, at the station, is undergoing a similar attempt to fight off his criminal thoughts. The two men meet, and, discovering that Porter is due at the station shortly for his night duties, they plan to rob his house after he has left. While Porter is gone his wife and baby play a game of "Hide and Seek," before the baby is ready for bed. Meanwhile, the two men gain entrance. When they enter, Mrs. Porter is seated in a chair, blindfolded, while the child is back of a chair, waiting for her mother to seek her. The mother is gagged and tied to the chair, and the men, not noticing the child, rush into the next room, to search for the money. The child comes out from behind the chair, pulls the gag down from her mother's mouth, and holds up the 'phone so that she can call her husband. This accomplished, the child pushes the gag back and hides behind the chair as the men come back into the room and demand knowledge of the hiding-place of the money. The woman refuses, and they are threatening her with bodily harm when her husband and the police enter. After a short fight the men are arrested, and the young husband takes his heroic little child and wife into his arms.

"JEALOUSY"

Reliance Release, March 23

John and Mary have been married but a short time, and are still in the honeymooners' class. John is called away on business one evening, much to his own disgust and his wife's dismay. He can hardly tear himself away, and comes back into the room repeatedly to fondly kiss her goodbye. After he has gone, she calls up her girl friend and asks her to come over and keep her from becoming lonesome. The girl agrees, but as she is leaving, she decides to make the call a lark, and puts on her brother's clothes, together with his long raincoat and slouch hat. The two girls have great fun until they hear John returning. Not wanting John to see the girl in such attire, the two girls slip off to Mary's room and lock themselves in. John comes in, and, of course, discovers the man's long coat and hat on a nearby chair. He also hears his wife's laughter in the other room. He is at once consumed with a mad jealousy, and goes to Mary's door and demands that he be admitted. Mary tells him that he can't, and will not give him a reason. John goes back downstairs, and gets his gun, vowing to kill them both. Mary slips out and downstairs, and meets John, but the fun dies out of her eyes when she realizes how he is doubting her. Angered by his jealousy, she refuses to give him any explanation, so John tells her he will leave her, and Mary goes back upstairs and cries on the other girl's shoulder. John slams the door and then hides behind the screen, and he hears footsteps on the stairs. The girls enter, and John jumps out from behind the screen, ready to kill. Ashamed of himself, he watches the girls out of the room, then falls on his knees before his wife's portrait and gives away to his emotions. His wife finds him there when she returns, and thinking he has learned a severe enough lesson, forgives him.

NESTOR

"You will like her!" so writes charming Grace, to her uncle, George Gaylord, referring to the traveling companion she's bringing home with her. The girl, however, is mistaken, for one glance at the mysterious woman is sufficient to displease Mr. Gaylord, who brusquely and almost brutally puts her out of his home. His strange behavior calls for an explanation, and telling the girl to listen, the uncle unfolds the story dealing with the woman's past life—a story in which he played so prominent a part.

As George speaks, we are made to peep into the days gone by. Many years before we see him as a happy young married man. But for Myrtle Merrill, a beautiful, vivacious, frivolous and heartless creature, he might be happy yet. She appears at a reception given by the Gaylords, and bent upon mischief, this snake-like being plies her wiles upon her host. George is dazzled by the woman's fascinations, and, as though in a trance, follows her out into the garden, where they are discovered by the young wife. Like a broken lily, she goes to her room and fails to conquer the impulse of self-immolation. Mrs. Gaylord's sudden and tragic end brings the bereaved husband to his senses. He spurns the adventuress' advances and shuts her out of his life forever.

Years later Myrtle Merrill worms her way into the home of the Russells. Her old mischievous nature plays havoc with the affairs of Henry Locke and Norma Russell. The young people's engagement is soon broken, for Henry is unable to withstand Myrtle's subtle power. Fortunately for the lovers, Mr. Gaylord pays a visit to his old friends, the Russels, and drives away the designing woman.

As Uncle George finishes his recital, Grace clings to him. Through the parted curtains, they watch the receding form of a woman. It is Myrtle Merrill going out into the world, friendless, hopeless, wretched, but thoroughly repentant.

THE DOUBLE TRAIL

Nestor Release, March 6

Two brothers Frank and Jack Morley, both love their mother's ward, Bess Rober. Both propose and Jack is accepted. Declaring that she will not hear from him until he has earned the right to claim her, he goes away.

At the railroad station he meets a tramp who asks aid. Jack gives him a nickel, saying that he has barely enough to buy his ticket. The tramp tells Jack he is foolish to spend his money for a ticket; he takes him to a freight car and proposes that Jack come along, as he is going the same way. Jack agrees. The next morning the tramp awakens first and calls Jack, who turns over, taking his head from off his coat in which his money has been placed. The temptation is too much for the tramp. He folds up his own coat, places it by Jack's head, then taking Jack's hat and coat, jumps from the moving train. His head hits a railroad tie. Some cowboys pick him up and take him to a nearby hotel, where he soon dies. The papers in his pocket proclaim him to be Jack Morley, of Placer, Nevada. Accordingly, the proprietor of the hotel wires his brother Frank. Frank comes on, sees the tramp, declares he is not his brother, but takes his coat, etc. Before he reaches home, however, Frank decides to carry out the deception to his own advantage, allowing his folks to believe that Jack is really dead, and thereby win Bess for himself.

A year later he receives the following letter from Jack:

"Dear Brother Frank: Have struck it lucky and am coming home. Not a word to the folks, as I want to give them a big surprise. Your brother, Jack."

Fearing his brother's return, Frank hurries to Bess and urges her to hasten their marriage. She agrees. Jack has reached the house in the meantime and overheard their conversation. He waits until his brother comes outside, then demands an explanation. From the sitting room Bess hears Jack's voice and hurries out, to rush into Jack's arms. Miserably Frank beats a retreat, while the mother enters and greets Jack.

THE VILLAGE RIVALS

Nestor Release, March 9

Dave Wells owns a grocery store and loves Miss Doublecatch, the village belle. Jim Cole also owns a grocery store and loves the same girl. All is fair in love and in business. The beauty likes both suitors and victory in this instance is sure to go to the swiftest. Dave and Jim do swift things, each endeavors to forestall the other, and do to one another what you would not want others to do unto you.

Jim is getting the upper hand and incidentally the girl, when Poeticus, the village scribe, comes to Dave's aid. The poetic mind evolves a prosaic plan. Dave is to court Widow Plunks, who is fat, fifty and rich, and Jim will be made to realize what a prize he's missing. The plan works most beautifully. So well does Poeticus shuffle his cards that Jim purchases a love sonnet for the widow, proposes to her and is accepted. Meanwhile, Dave has had plain sailing and wins the village belle. Jim goes out driving with the widow and inwardly rejoices for having "cut out" Dave. His rejoicings, however, receive a terrible jolt when he meets his hated rival driving and happy with the girl he has loved and lost.

ARIZONA

(Scenic on Same Reel)

Arizona, the new state and latest star to be added to "Old Glory," is now very much in the public eye. Some Arizona scenic gems have already been seen in Nestor pictures. This one is by far the most interesting yet filmed. It takes us to Sessers Point, where a complete panoramic circle of the famed canyons is spread before our astonished gaze. We feast in wonder after a vista as grand as it is awe-inspiring, and actually tremble at its terrifying immensity. A trail party, some 3,500 feet down a canyon, is also shown.

THE FATAL GLASS

Champion Release, March 11th

George Marston leaves his ideal, happy home to go to his work. He is a clerk in the office of Wm. Hall, a broker. On his way to the office, Marston meets with two friends, who insist on treating him. He accompanies them into a saloon, and calls for a temperance drink. They ridicule him for this, and insist on his taking a glass of liquor. Now, Marston has a fatal weakness—if he takes one glass, he cannot resist taking a number. He succumbs to their ridicule, and tastes of the liquor, and that one glass proves fatal to him.

When he arrives at his desk in the broker's office, he is very late and slightly intoxicated, for which two reasons the broker very properly discharges him. In his befuddled condition he threatens the broker, and he is ejected from the office. Shortly after this a blackmailer turns up at the broker's office. Confronted by a "ghost of the past," the broker is driven to desperation.

The "blackmailer" gives the broker fifteen minutes to decide on making an impossible payment—to make the payment he must rob the firm, and it is disgrace or death, and he chooses the latter. In the meantime, the clerk, Marston, has returned home, bringing sorrow to his wife and babe. The tears of the wife arouse in him his latent goodness and manhood, and he solemnly vows he will never again taste the fatal glass. With this resolution made, he starts back to the office to make a plea for reinstatement. He arrives just as the broker has committed self-destruction and Marston is accused of the crime. He is convicted, and receives a life sentence, and we see him working out the weary years on a stone pile.

In the meantime, his wife goes back to the home of her childhood, taking her little boy along. Years pass, and the boy grows to manhood. He marries, and brings his wife to live with his mother, and a beautiful little girl blesses the union. In after years the blackmailer gets into the toils, being caught red-handed in a burglary. He is convicted, and makes an attempt to escape from prison, and is shot and mortally wounded. Having recognized in prison the man who was wrongly accused of the crime of murder, he tells all that he knows concerning the matter, and Marston is liberated and starts for the place where he won his sweetheart. He arrives in the village and is begging for food, when a child takes pity on him. The child proves to be his granddaughter, and the meeting leads to a visit to his wife, and the reunion is graphic and intense—a reward for years of suffering.

The story is simply told, yet there is a wealth of human emotion. No finer visualization will be seen on the screen for many a day than this wonderful story of "The Fatal Glass."

THE EDITOR

Champion Release, March 13th

Here is a most unusual picture play, entirely out of the ordinary. Unexpected climaxes are the rule, with situations that are splendidly wrought out.

An election has just been held for district commissioner, and George Mason is the successful candidate. He is surrounded by his supporters offering him their influence, and among them are a number of toughs, typical politicians, well known to conductors of questionable resorts.

His sweetheart, Alice Fisher, congratulates him next day on his victory, and tells him he can do great and lasting good for the community in the way of bringing about reforms. He tells her that no matter what his inclinations may be he can do nothing to offend his supporters. His attitude in this respect brings about an estrangement between himself and his sweetheart. Later, we see him granting a favor to one of the most notorious gamblers in the city, and he does so under stress of circumstances, and is thoroughly disgusted with himself in consequence. A month later, the father of Alice Fisher purchases the leading newspaper of the city, and the divekeeper, the friend of Mason, has become a stench in the nostrils of all law-abiding citizens.

A woman whose husband has been fleeced in his dive calls at the office of the sheriff and asks him to close the place, but the sheriff is bribed, and nothing comes of the appeal. Then a minister takes a hand to bring about reform, and he is bluffed.

The paper owned by the father of Alice takes up the cudgel, and the methods of the gambler are shown up in scathing terms. He decides to call down the editor, and when he arrives at the office he is met by the charming young woman, Alice Fisher, who tells him she is the editor and responsible for the utterances of the paper, and he retires crestfallen, but vindictive. The fair editress is in the fight to a finish, and the bluffer's place is stormed by indignant women, who oust him, bag and baggage.

Then the political cohorts appeal to the district commissioner to down the editor, and the commissioner takes his orders and sends for the editor, only to be surprised and filled with consternation when he discovers that the editor is his quandom sweetheart, Alice Fisher. He is importuned by the crooked politicians to use every means in his power in their behalf, and he is confronted with a dilemma.

There stands his sweetheart and all that is uplifting and ennobling on one hand, and the dive-keeper and brothel-house proprietor on the other, and in the balance hangs his own fate—for good or evil. It is a wonderful climax, and he chooses—the right. The pure love of a sweet woman redeems him, and he severs his connection with the undesirable element. Of course, he marries the girl, and is thus rewarded.

"The Editor" is a gripping story of every-day life, and the political situations are true to life.

THE MYSTERY

Powers Release, March 9th

Circumstantial evidence has convicted many an innocent person, and sent them to their death or to life imprisonment. In this weird story, a young man is convicted of the murder of his sweetheart's father and is only saved at the eleventh hour by an important discovery made by his rival in love who also was the judge who sentenced him. The real cause of the old man's death was a microscope, which acted as a sun glass and discharged an antique pistol.

SOGARTH AROON

Powers Release, March 16th

Pretty Kitty O'Toole has two paths open to her; one leading to wealth and apparent happiness as the wife of the young lord while the other leads her along the same way she has always traveled—the life of the simple Irish peasant—as the helpmeet of plain Terence O'Fallon.

Influenced by a terrible and prophetic vision and advised by the good old priest, Sogarth Aroon, she is led to choose the humbler path and remain within her own proper sphere.

THE POWER BEHIND THE THRONE

Powers Release, March 12th

The scene of this powerful drama is laid in Austria at the time when the government upheld petty tyranny and oppression on the part of the nobility.

The theme of the play deals with a court intrigue which drags into the meshes of its fiendish net two young lovers, one of whom is of the highest rank, while the other belongs to the unprotected middle class. Aria is the daughter of a gifted but poor musician and the idol of her parents. A handsome young baron, while riding past Aria's home is thrown from his horse and injured. His orderly seeks relief for his master in the musician's house, where the nobleman is cared for most carefully by Aria and her mother. The first person to meet the Baron's gaze when he returns to consciousness is the beautiful Aria, and it is love at first sight between them.

The Baron's father, the Governor, has been notified of his son's accident, and hastens to his side, and thanks the musician and his wife for their attentions offering them money, but Aria's father firmly refuses payment for a mere act of kindness. In the Governor's suite is his secretary, an evil man, who is also smitten with the charms of Aria and when the balance of the party withdraw, he remains and attempts to make love to her. His advances are scornfully rejected by Aria and he leaves the house filled with hatred against her and her entire household.

The baron, longing to again see the musician's daughter, becomes her father's pupil. The secretary keeps watch upon the lovers and only awaits the opportunity to ruin their happiness. The King writes the Governor, informing him that his son, the baron must marry at once a duchess who possesses none too good a reputation. The secretary tells the Governor that the baron will not consent to forming such an alliance because he is already engaged to marry the musician's daughter. The Governor hastens to Aria's home, and there finds the baron and hands him the King's letter. The baron angrily tears up the letter and, defying his father, declares he will marry no one but Aria. The Governor then gives the secretary carte blanche to plot against Aria. In the first place, however, the duchess calls upon Aria, and tries to intimidate her, but Aria is not awed by her lofty rank, and replies to the lady's insults by opening the door and ordering her from the house.

The first step of the secretary is to obtain the aid of a gay young count who also admires Aria's beauty and would give anything to have her in his power. Then the father and mother of Aria are arrested and placed in the public pillory, and Aria is told that the only way she can have them set free will be for her to write and sign a certain letter and obey every other order of the secretary. She is summoned to appear at a court ball and is given a handsome gown to wear. It is intended by the plotters that Aria shall show great fondness for the count and ignore the baron. She is then to be given drugged wine and carried away by the count. However, the duchess' maid and the baron's orderly are sweethearts, and through the maid the orderly discovers the nature of the plot, and warns Aria not to drink the wine. During the ball, the letter which Aria wrote is dropped, picked up and shown to the baron who is thus led to believe Aria false, and he upbraids her before the whole court. Aria is unable to defend herself, knowing that the lives of her father and mother depend upon her silence.

Later, the baron, driven to desperation visits Aria for one last interview before taking his life by means of poison. While he is talking with her the orderly enters and substitutes for the poison the narcotic formerly intended for Aria.

The baron drinks the supposed poison, and Aria, losing all desire to live, drinks it also. Then, believing herself to be dying, she tells the baron the truth respecting the letter, and he begs to be forgiven for his unjust suspicions. The two then become unconscious, and are discovered shortly afterward by the Governor and his suite, who come in search of the baron. Aria's father and mother, who have been set free, arrive at the same time. Every one believes the young couple to be dead, and the duchess, the secretary and the count withdraw. Then the orderly explains to the Governor and Aria's parents how he substituted a narcotic for the poison, and the lovers are finally resuscitated. A final reconciliation takes place between Aria and her family and the Governor, who welcomes Aria to his arms. Then, through Aria's instrumentality, the baron is led into forgiving his father, the Governor.

FOR HER SAKE

Great Northern Release, March 9th

Marjory is happily married to Jack, and the two of them dote upon their offspring. Presently, however, Marjory's first love, a yachtsman, whom she had given up as lost, returns. Calling upon her, he is welcomed by Jack as a friend, and the serpent is installed in Paradise. The light of the love that lasts still flickers in Marjory's bosom, and she falls a ready prey to the first love's advances. He endeavors to induce her to elope with him, but the sight of her little one recalls her to her sense of duty. Six months later her husband is called away, and leaves home for a long journey. No sooner has he departed than the yachtsman turns up again, and resumes his overtures. Leading him to her room Marjory shows him her sleeping child, and says: "She will always stand between you and me." Meanwhile the husband has missed his train and returns home, thus discovering his wife under suspicious circumstances. The yachtsman escapes by the window, but is observed by a trusted servant, who informs her master. Finding he is discovered the man again returns to the bedroom, where he is captured by Jack who, finding him with a jewel box under his arm, imagines him to be a thief and orders him out of the house.

MAKING HEROES
Rex Release, March 7

The psychology of heroism is a subtle little matter. It is deeper than the Panama Canal, more vague than a politician's promises. The forces, traits, circumstances or substances that go to make a hero are indefinable and undiscernible. But — here is the truth the Rex Company emphasizes in its unique production, "Making Heroes"—heroism can be developed! We all have within us that instinct of helping our fellows to the hazard of ourselves that has made society and civilization. The even tenor of our regular ways and the orderly routine of our lives have partly submerged our heroic sense; but the faculty is dormant in all of us, and when crisis or emergency demand its presence, it manifests itself in prompt and powerful fashion. The Rex Company is heroic enough to state that we are all amateur heroes.

But to be a professional hero, to adopt heroism as a business, requires more than the garden variety of courage. And the greatest aggregation of unadulterated heroism in the world is to be found in the fire departments of this country.

The City of Denver has the best equipped and most efficient fire department in the world. We do not venture to state that this is because the men of Denver are more valorous or courageous than other humans, but we do imply that it might be due to the effective training school connected with the department, in which the firemen are once a month rehearsed in a sham battle with the flames, from the first stage to the last of the fire-fighter's arduous art.

The Rex Company locomoted a camera down to Denver and photographed the stirring scenes depicted during one of these dress rehearsals. The engines rush to the scene of bogus peril, and the firemen set to work very earnestly to conquer the imaginary flames. Thrilling rescues are effected, daring risks assumed, danger and death completely disregarded. So is heroism manufactured.

And just to make it doubly interesting, on the same reel:

BLOWING UP THE JOHN DAY RAPIDS

We have neither the confidence nor the con of the average gambler, but we will wager that most of your friends have never heard of the engineering operation by which water is blasted. The U. S. Government recently blew up the John Day Rapids, and—Rex was there! Several hundred feet of interesting celluloid show how the scientific feat was performed. A general view of the rapids and rocks to be blasted, loading the rolls with powder, drilling in water for blast, loading the sacks with dynamite, lowering the powder in sacks into the water—and then—the rapids by moonlight.

SONGS OF CHILDHOOD DAYS
Rex Release, March 10

There was poverty in that little country home, but there was also its one redeeming corollary, hope. Hope, the Rex Company thinks, is the music in the comic opera of life; and strangely enough, their hope was represented in the girl's violin. For the magic notes were the sounds of genius, and the two dreamed of the day when the violin would triumph over the dismal drear of their lives. It was the dream of the dawn of storm-wrecked souls on the shores and shoals of night.

So the loyal little mother gave the girl the meagre surplus, and she came with her hope and her genius to the far-away city. Her music sang its way into the hearts of the metropolis, and she became famed and favored.

Then she met him, and he loved her. The dawn broke, and with it a human heart. He was the son of aristocratic and arrogant wealth, but she loved him for himself. And in her love and its happiness and the ecstacy of her triumph she forgot the humble home and the tender, trusting mother and the hope and the glad things it meant. The short and seldom letters soon ceased entirely, and the anxious mother-heart hungered and yearned for news of the girl. So she came to the city.

And there the mother learned life's definition of despair. The girl made it evident that her presence displeased and embarrassed her; so with the new realization and the old ache, she returned to the farm.

A few weeks later the girl received the news that scattered and shattered her joys. Her mother had made her last earthly pilgrimage to her last earthly hope—had gone over the hills with her ills to the poor-house. With a sob she read the accusing words and heard her heart and its true message.

Love knows no caste—so she told him, told him all; and together they went to her. Outside the old mother's room she stood and played the songs of her childhood; and ghosts of the dreams of the past visited the desolate woman's mind, and phantom smiles lighted up her face with the old happiness and the old hope. Still the girl played, and the haunting, happy notes floated into the room and into the soul of the woman, and her heart responded. She moved toward whence the message of another day had come; she opened the door that was the barrier between herself and the resurrection of a dead desire—and she was clasped to the redeemed heart of the girl.

BLIGHTED LIVES

Solax

Solax has found an excellent subject in "Blighted Lives." There is no doubt that many a man has found himself behind prison bars through the jealousy and longing for revenge of a rival, whether in domestic or business life.

This picture is well put on, and the plot well worked out. The photography, which is an all important point, is good. The fact that no weak spot is visible in the filming of this story should strongly recommend it to the exhibitor.

EXTRAVAGANCE

Thanhouser

The film of Thanhouser's entitled, "Extravagance," is another excellent production. We notice it specially because it has a moral which is so lucidly explained as to make it of great value to the public, not alone as an entertainer, but as a good, solid, moral lesson. The young girl in the story, who caused her father's financial ruin and drove him to extreme measures of desperation, is but one of the deplorable many.

S. S. HUTCHINSON BUYS WINTER HOME

S. S. Hutchinson, President of the American Film Mfg. Company, has just received the deed to one of the handsomest pieces of property in the El Cajon Valley, Southern California.

The purchase was made while Mr. Hutchinson was on his long visit to the Western studio, located at La Mesa, recently. The property is situated on Pasadena avenue in the heart of La Mesa's exclusive residence section and realizes an old wish of Mr. Hutchinson's that he might secure one of the really fine properties for which La Mesa is noted. General Nelson A. Miles, Madam Nordica, Owen Wister, Lillian Russell, and many other notables are property holders in and about La Mesa.

SPECIAL NOTICE

Moving Picture News Absorbs the Tales

For the first time in our existence when we have put our hand to the plough we have had to stop at the third furrow, but it sometimes happens in a man's life that he takes more responsibility on his shoulders and more burdens than he can well carry. Such was the case with the Moving Picture Tales. It divided our energies too much, and we don't believe it is right to overburden one's self too much; hence the monthly issue of the Tales will not come out for the present. It is due to our readers, to the exhibitors, who so loyally supported us, and to the vast number of readers who subscribed to the Tales, to say that we give them our best thanks, and that their subscription will be returned to them if they so desire it, or it can be placed to continuation of the News. So great has been the demand for these Tales, which have been so admirably written by Miss Virginia West, that we have decided to increase the size of the News and place the tales in the inner portion, and give two or three tales each week so that readers will not be disappointed. We think it will add to the value of the News as a home journal to insert these stories in it as we outline, and one point especially to be brought to the attention of the exhibitor is this—we will endeavor to storyize a film each week before the date of release, and if the exhibitor will get a good reader in his house to read this story to the audience it will add zest to the picture when it comes or even as it goes on the screen, so that the people will understand the drift of the silent drama. We believe this innovation will add value to the house, interest the patrons and put dimes into the pockets of the proprietors, because the people are beginning to demand something in the way of a lecturette, and many letters on our desk ask the query why it is not possible to lecture on some of the most important films they have in their house. This will go a large way to overcome their difficulties.

By this action we do not imply that we intend to drop the Tales altogether. We may at a later date continue them when we see that the demand is sufficiently great to entitle us once more to make the venture on behalf of the numerous patrons of the moving picture exhibit.

KINEMACOLOR PATENTS

The article by William E. Smith on another page is the first contribution in the history of Kinemacolor ever attempted, and rather than divide so important a subject, which we consider valuable in the interests of cinematography, we have crowded out other articles, and we trust our readers will bear with us until our next issue, as we have put in only what we consider absolutely excellent this week.

The article is copyrighted, but can be used by asking permission from us. We have already been requested to allow its publication in other journals. This permission will only be granted on application and by letter from us. Others attempting to use extracts will be proceeded against under the copyright laws of America.

THE QUESTION OF PATENTS

Quite a number of people have called us up regarding the patent question, and several letters remain unanswered as to the value of a patent in America. We are not biased, and we are not begging the question, when we say that anyone can get a patent in the Patent Office at Washington. It needs very little trouble, indeed, to secure it, but it needs a great deal of money to defend it when obtained. It seems to us the only value the Patent Office has is the fact that it enables quite a large number of patent attorneys to make a living. A device is taken down to a patent attorney, and he immediately sees his fee to prosecute it and tells the client, "Oh, yes; oh, yes, it is patentable," and so the Patent Office is flooded with patents that are not worth the paper they are written upon. This is written especially for out-of-country patentees, as well as to those who have written us asking advice as to how they can apply for a patent and the value when obtained.

The chief reason for writing the above is the fact that within the last three weeks six different inventors have approached us with the question of patenting a metallic surface screen on which to project the pictures. We have told them it is not possible to get a patent on a screen that will hold water. There are now on the market screens galore, some simply painted on the canvas, some with the metal worked in, some with dull, some with bright surface, the mirror screen and imitation mirror screens. All are exceedingly good in themselves, and yet in our opinion a patent covering any of them will be absolutely useless. This kind of screen has been in use to our knowledge anywhere within the past twenty-five years. We have used them in Kings College, London; in St. John's College, Oxford, and Birmingham University; some that we made ourselves, some that had been prepared for us, and all combining the same principles used to-day.

In our issue of May 2, 1908, we gave full instruction how to make the screen, and anyone following out these instructions can pretty well satisfy themselves of the value of a surface-coated screen, so that our advice to readers and correspondents is, do not waste money in taking out patents on screen projects unless you have something entirely different from anything else. We will try and reproduce in an early issue our article on screens for the benefit of those who wish to experiment for themselves.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Quite a large number of people have written to us stating that they know very little about the routine of the business. They are about to open a show, to purchase one already in existence, to get a machine for their church, their club, or society, and asking our advice as to the best machine to purchase. Some request that we answer them in the columns of the News, stating in our opinion what we consider to be the best machine for universal work. Of course, to answer such questions would cause very invidious comparisons, and as we cannot take this attitude we have personally written to the members recommending them to apply to the various manufacturers and compare for themselves. We now, for the benefit of other readers, embody in this note what we have put in our letters: "In reply to your communication, we are utterly unable to tell you which is the best machine on the market. They all have remarkably good points and of their class appeal to special individuals. We therefore suggest you to write to the various manufacturers asking them for a catalogue, and then on the advice of some operator select what you consider the best suited to your pocket and requirements."

We suggest to each reader that they write to the following manufacturers for their catalogues. These catalogues have remarkably good information that every operator and exhibitor should know. They are written specially to point out the various possibilities in the machine purchased and as a valuable guide to each man. We can fully recommend that they place these catalogues on their files for reference in case of emergencies. We have always contended that an exhibitor should know as much about the machine he uses as the operator himself, and also be just as capable of working that machine in case of some sudden indisposition on the part of the operator. The addresses of the various manufacturers are as follows: Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Co., 568 West Randolph street, Chicago, Ill.; Powers Cameragraph Co., 90 Gold street, New York; Simplex Machine Co., 23 East 14th street, New York; Edison Manufacturing Co., East Orange, N. J.; Acme Machine Co., 133 Third avenue, New York; C. E. Dressler, 386 Second avenue, New York. These are the best machines on the market to-day and are all that we can honestly recommend to our readers. There are three other machines we are conversant with, but they are not yet available for the trade. We will give our readers full information concerning them in due time, but in the meantime let every reader who has his own interests at heart write immediately to the above manufacturers for catalogues of their machines, even if they only send a postal card requesting the same. The information will come to hand and will prove of help to each possessor.

SARAH THE DIVINE, IN M. P.'s

"I have conquered a new world—that of the photo-play," writes Sarah Bernhardt to W. F. Connor, her American manager, apropos of her playing "Camille" before the camera of the French-American Film Company. "I never thought, my dear William, that I would ever be a film, but now that I am two whole reels of pictures I rely for my immortality upon these records."

Under the management of Mr. Connor, Bernhardt played to over $3,000,000 in this country in two tours and proved herself the greatest box office attraction that the stage has ever known. She was repeatedly asked while in this country to pose for moving pictures, but always refused, hence, it was a great surprise to Connor to hear that Sarah had capitulated to the camera. It took a great deal of persuasion and $30,000 in money to induce Bernhardt to play "Camille" before the camera, but when she finally made up her mind she entered into the arrangements with the enthusiasm of a schoolgirl. She visited motion picture shows in all parts of Paris, spent hours in studios and talked with operators and actors. In a short while she was an encyclopedia of information about the new art.

"Camille" was rehearsed a few times with the watch to get it timed right, and then on a set date Bernhardt and her powerful company went right through the performance before the motion picture camera. She played with wonderful fire and expressiveness. Great genius that she is she suited herself to her medium and the result is a long series of photographs that are staccato in their expressiveness. The story is revealed as plain as print. "Camille" was never more pitifully eloquent than in this dumb record. Bernhardt could hardly wait to see an exhibition of the pictures in the studio. When the operator started and the photo-play began to transpire upon the screen she was almost hysterical with excitement. After seeing the two reels she insisted that they be run off all over again and this was done. At the finish she turned to Edmond Rostand, who accompanied her, and asked:

"What next for me?"

"Camille" is a perfect photo-play. The story lends itself to the purposes of the camera, and Bernhardt is eloquent in every movement. Someone has said that the pictures fairly crackle with life and project wireless messages to the spectators. All over Europe the photo-play "Camille" is a sensation and Americans are eagerly awaiting the release of these reels, which are now in the control of the French-American Film Company, which is rapidly disposing of State rights. This company also controls the great photo-play, "Sans Gene," posed by Rejane.

PICTURE THEATRE AT DAYTON, OHIO
Where the Moving Picture Exhibitors League of Ohio will hold their convention on March 26th and 27th, 1912.

THE SLOGAN IS, "ON TO DAYTON, MARCH 26 AND 27, 1912"

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Ohio is growing very rapidly; an organizer is constantly in the field, and all the exhibitors of Ohio have awakened to the fact that the benefits derived from the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Ohio has done them a great deal of good and protected their interests and many are sending in their applications without being solicited. Many new states are coming into the League, and before the convention meets in Chicago in August we expect to enroll nearly every state in the Union.

The Dayton Convention is an assured success, and will be the biggest convention ever held by our League. Every motion picture exhibitor is invited to attend whether he is a member of the League or not, also all the friends of the motion picture exhibitors are invited to attend, and we assure everybody that they will be as welcome as the flowers in May and what they will see and hear will convince them that the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America is a real organization and knows how to do things.

The most powerful telescope in the world is now being focused on the moon, and it is to be hoped that we will be able, at Dayton, to show the moon on the motion picture curtain, at least the effort is now being made and promises success. So again it is demonstrated that cinematography is the greatest educator and assistant science has ever known.

Reasons why you should be at Dayton, Ohio, March 26 and 27, 1912:

Dear Sir and Brother:

You should see and know all that is going on at Dayton.

You will receive information which cannot be written to you.

You will receive pointers worth many dollars to you.

You will receive a new membership card.

You will get a membership certificate to hang in front of your theatre.

You will receive a badge that will admit you to Dayton picture theatres.

You will receive buttons that will be recognized for fare on street cars.

You will be in the automobile parade.

You will hear Senator J. B. Foraker, Congressman J. M. Cox, Hon. J. J. Lentz and Edward W. Phillips, Mayor of Dayton, speak.

SENATOR J. B. FORAKER, OF CINCINNATI, OHIO
Counsel for the M. P. E. of America.

You will meet all the national officers of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America; they will be there.

You are invited to take a trip through the Cash Register Works.

You will see Kinemacolor and several feature pictures.

You will see many makes and kinds of machinery and curtains.

You will see the largest and strongest telescope in the world.

You will be in two motion pictures, Pathe Freres and one other.

You will meet exhibitors from all parts of the country.

You will be at a banquet given by the Dayton Chamber of Commerce free.

You will have the time of your life, and if you are not there you will always regret it.

I am working day and night to make this convention a grand success. Our Dayton committee, the Dayton Chamber of Commerce and the National Cash Register Company are doing all they can to make this the biggest convention Dayton has ever known. Now, brother, get busy and push. It is not only your pleasure but your plain business duty to be at Dayton on March 26 and 27. You will run the motion pictures taken at Dayton, so do not fail to be in them. The Board of Directors of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America will meet at the Phillips House at 8 o'clock p. m. March 25, 1912, and will be in attendance on the 26th and 27th, as Ohio is the parent organization. Let every Ohio exhibitor be there, bringing as many of your family as you can. A plate will be reserved at the banquet for you and yours. Urge every exhibitor to come that you know.

Please send me at once the names of every exhibitor in your county. Do it now. I must have the names of the owners and their theatres at once.

Fraternally,
J. J. HUSS, Secretary,
Cincinnati, Ohio

MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS OF PENNSYLVANIA TO ORGANIZE

On Thursday, February 29, Sydney Ascher and H. A. Mackie visited Scranton, Pa., at the invitation of the exhibitors of the State of Pennsylvania, who met at 4 p. m. on that day for the purpose of organizing an exhibitors' association.

Mr. Ascher was voted chairman and addressed the meeting in a most convincing manner, showing the great advantages to be derived through organization.

The meeting was held at the Hotel Casey and so convincing was Mr. Ascher's address that of the 41 exhibitors present every one joined the newly formed organization. There was great enthusiasm displayed in the project by the Pennsylvania exhibitors, and although all of the 100 exhibitors of Lucerne and Lackawanna counties, to which this organization belongs were not able to be present, many of those who were not requested were there to sign for them.

Those present were representatives of the following places: Hyde Park, Dunmore, Providence, Pittston, Plymouth and Wilkesbarre.

The headquarters of the organization, which will be known as the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Northeastern Pennsylvania, will be at Scranton, Pa. Mr. M. E. Comerford of the "Wonders" Theatre, and also connected with a theatre circuit along with some others, was chosen president of the organization.

A full list of the officers of the organization will be given in our next issue.

PRESERVING RECORDS OF GREAT ARTISTS

There is a movement on foot for the perpetuation of the work of some of our most talented actors and actresses. The General Film Publicity and Sales Company, of New York, interviewed recently at their offices on the tenth floor of 145 West Forty-fifth street, stated that they purpose the commencement of a campaign of this commendable character.

This company has also negotiated for a large number of highly educational subjects from Europe, suitable for use in schools and colleges.

FICHTENBERG ENTERPRISES

Mr. Herman Fichtenberg, of New Orleans, yesterday closed one of the biggest real estate deals handled in the last few years when he leased from the Metropolitan Bank, for fifteen years, the vacant property on Canal street, between the Maison Blanche and Audubon buildings.

This is undoubtedly one of the finest locations in the city, and as the lease is for fifteen years, it speaks well for the great changes in store for Canal street, the pride of New Orleans. It also speaks well for local enterprise when a man like Mr. Fichtenberg, who has made his business reputation in this city, shows what confidence he has in New Orleans, when he will lease this valuable property for one of his enterprises. There have been many outside interests trying for this same lease, and Mr. Fichtenberg is to be congratulated on keeping this among local interests.

He will immediately start the erection of a motion picture theatre of the highest class, capable of seating eight hundred people on one floor. The site will be used exclusively for the purpose of a moving picture house, and all of the most up-to-date improvements will be installed with a view of making this building as near perfect as possible; and for climatic conditions an air-cooling process has been contracted for, which in summer will reduce the interior temperature fully fifteen degrees from that of exterior, and in winter the building is to be heated by the same system forcing the air over water-cleaned screens.

Contracts have been let with the Coburn Organ Company for a five-thousand-dollar ($5,000.00) pipe organ; also a contract for one of the largest mirror screens ever made, measuring 162 inches by 216 inches, and which is the latest perfected object on which to project moving pictures.

The building will be absolutely fireproof, and will have five exits in the front and two in the rear.

The design of the exterior will be purely Italian, while the interior will be most elaborately decorated with frescoes and ornamental plastering effects.

Plans for the building are being drawn by one of the best known architects in the city, Mr. Emile Weil, and construction of the work has been allotted to Mr. George J. Glover, the well-known contractor.

The theatre will measure 50 x 143, and will be named the Isis Theatre.

The cost of this theatre will be in the neighborhood of $100,000 when completed.

Mr. Fichtenberg was interviewed by our reporter and says he will construct the finest moving picture theatre in the country. Mr. Fichtenberg also stated that anybody who visits other cities and countries can say that they have, in New Orleans, the finest moving picture theatre in the country. This will help boost our city.

He also states that he will not spare any expense for the comfort of the patrons, and will use, as in the past, the Independent film service, and the best entertainers obtainable, and will select the films, particularly catering to the patronage of the ladies and children.

Mr. Fichtenberg, who is the proprietor of the Fichtenberg's Enterprises, has as his able assistants all local men, for with Mr. Wm. H. Gueringer as general manager and Mr. Carl Goldenberg as assistant manager, the public will find that nothing will be overlooked in giving New Orleans the best that money can buy in the moving picture business

Mr. Fichtenberg also owns and operates the Isis Theatre, Houston, Texas; Alamo Theatre, Vicksburg, Miss.; Dream World, Picto, and Alamo theatres, in New Orleans, and controlling the Consolidated Film & Supply Co. and also the Feature Film Co. of Louisiana.

We wish to congratulate Mr. Herman Fichtenberg.

NEW THEATRE FOR YONKERS

Mr. J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," advises us that he has just booked an order from the Square Amusement Co., Yonkers, N. Y., for their complete equipment, consisting of 300 opera chairs, Motiograph No. 1a, 1912 model, Hallberg Special A. C. Economizer, and all accessory supplies. Mr. Hallberg also reports the sale of three of his A. C. to D. C. Economizers during the past week.

Marshalltown, Ia.—The Busby Theatrical Company has been organized with a capital of $1,200, W. L. Busby, of Quincy, Ill., and others.

RUSSELL BASSETT
(Of the Nestor Film Co.)

Russell Bassett is one of the most popular of our "grand old men" actors.

For upwards of forty years Mr. Bassett has successfully followed the stage. It is a real pleasure to be privileged to watch the old man rehearsing his work. He is the real character in the play—he puts all the force and energy of both his mental and physical self into his work.

Mr. Bassett has now for more than a year been playing character leads with the Nestor Film Co., and his presence on the screen is looked for quite as anxiously as that of the pretty young leading lady.

A REJOINDER

CINCINNATI, OHIO, March 2, 1912.

Mr. Alfred M. Saunders,
New York, N. Y.

Dear Sir and Friend:

The writer has been out of the city for several days and on coming back and looking over your valued paper of February 24 I was certainly surprised at the article I read therein.

The article I refer to is on page 35 and is headed Cincinnati, Ohio, January 20, 1912. The article is signed by S. C. Duryee.

The reason I was surprised was because there is nobody in the world knows how we stood for the independents better than you do, as you have attended many a meeting and know from the beginning that we were always independent, heart and soul.

We have spent thousands of dollars fighting for the independent cause, and for the benefit of the exhibitors in general, and you can rest assured that we have never at any time attempted to form any trust or monopoly in the moving picture business.

We were also surprised because, both of us knowing one another as well as we do, that you would print such an article as this without first investigating to see whether or not it was true.

We have always spoken a good word for you and your paper, have tried very hard to get exhibitors in this section of the country to subscribe for same, because we felt that your paper was always fair and square with the independents, and if you remember at the banquet held in Chicago the writer was the first one to get on the floor and speak for The Moving Picture News and do everything to increase its circulation.

Hoping that you will repudiate this statement made in your paper, and state that the Cincinnati-Buckeye Film Company pronounce this an absolute falsehood, and in our opinion was done to injure our standing with the exhibitors, with whom we have always dealt fairly, in every sense of the word, otherwise we would not have built up from an 8 x 10 room eight years ago to one of the largest film renting concerns, occupying an entire building at the present time, and without owing any man in the world a dollar, we remain,

Yours very truly,

McMAHAN & JACKSON.

P. S.—We thank you for all favors received at your hands, and hope that the friendship we have for Alfred Saunders will always remain the same, and his friendship for us likewise.

(We gladly publish the above letter from I. W. McMahan. The letter we inserted in our Feb. 24th issue being duly signed and attested, we took it that the writer, S. C. Duryee had backing for his statements, and as several exhibitors from other parts of the State had written in a similar strain, we published it. However, never again!—Ed. M. P. N.)

WHERE IS MR. SCHULTZ?

The Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Co., of 564-572 West Randolph street, corner Jefferson, Chicago, wish to announce publicly that Mr. E. A. Schultz formerly a demonstrator in their employ is no longer connected with their company in any capacity, and that they are not responsible for his debts or obligations of any kind.

They are also offering $10.00 reward for information leading to the recovery of the 1912 model Motiograph Outfit, trunks, etc., which were used by Mr. Schultz for demonstration work.

The last heard of Mr. Schultz he was on his way to Nelson, B. C., Canada, but telegrams and mail sent to that address remain unanswered, although they have used every possible effort to get in touch with Mr. Schultz.

GOOD NEWS FOR EXHIBITORS—GAUMONT'S ANIMATED WEEKLY

The great popularity of the weekly news in picture form necessitates the keenest intellects getting their wits together, evolving what is most suitable to the patrons of the theatre. We have pleasure this week in stating that the Gaumont Animated Weekly will be released through the Sales Company on Wednesday, March 13th, and we advise all our readers to get very busy to see that they secure this release. Send in your wires, or your requests immediately, to the Gaumont Company, Flushing. We congratulate both the Sales Company and Gaumont upon this scoop of what will ultimately prove the best money getter in the business. To give an idea of the topics that will be shown, we take the recent railway accident, the landing of Shuster from Persia, the floods in Pennsylvania, President Taft, and a host of other important events which will be gathered up daily and put in the form which will make a very interesting educational film each week. Again, we say to our readers, get busy. Exhibitors, wire your exchange; exchange, wire the Sales Company or Gaumont. See that you do not miss this release.

SIDE LIGHTS ON THE CINEMATOGRAPH

The Censor in England—(Concluded)

By Leonard Donaldson

IN the two previous articles the matter of the official dramatic censorship has been explained, as it obtains in England. Now, let us turn our attention to the movement which is on foot for the formation of a picture-play censorship. As I stated in the last article, various opinions have been expressed by various prominent members of the film business in London. The manager of one of the principal West End theatres says: "Personally, I do not think a censor is needed. We are most particular for our own sake that nothing shall be shown that can give offense to the most sensitive mind. Our pictures are already doubly censored. First, the director of the film department witnesses a demonstration at the agent's, and then we have a private rehearsal. This means that the film is not only free from details generally unsuitable, but that it also contains nothing that might offend the class of audience to which we in particular cater. An official censorship would be beset with difficulty. One man could not possibly see all the films; and the appointment of a committee in which complete accord prevailed is not at all a simple matter. The production of cinematograph films is now an enormous industry, and great care would have to be experienced in instituting any control. Such a censorship would find very little to justify its existence!

The London manager of Jury's Imperial Pictures (Limited)—an agency dealing with films of all nationalities, expressed indifference upon the matter. "It is rarely," he said, "that one hears of any film giving the slightest offense. Great discretion is exercised in the selection of films for English reproduction. The fervid love stories that find favor in Germany would certainly produce criticism here, and knowing this, we carefully avoid them. The censorship existing in the United States is, I think, more concerned with the color problem. There is never any question of impropriety in any American film that enters this country. I see no reason why we should object to a censor, for we should not suffer in any way. No films coming through our hands could possibly give offense to a censor. There are, at a fair estimate, over 100 new films 'released' daily in England, of an average length of 1,000 feet. It takes fifteen minutes for the exhibition of such a film; so that an equivalent of 25 hours' censorship would be required in each 24."

The opinion of Mr. V. Steer, the editor of Pathe's Animated Gazette, I find equally indifferent. "If the authorities think that a censor is necessary, by all means let us have one," he says. "I have never seen a film to which one could raise a reasonable objection, if viewed from the standpoint of an ordinary theatrical subject. Our pictures undergo a triple censorship before leaving us. First, they have a trial run before our manager. Then, they are repeated before a private committee, acquainted with the general requirements of the English picture theatre, and, lastly, they are displayed in our own projection theatre to the buyers. Anything that might possibly be misconstrued is immediately eliminated."

These statements should have the effect of reassuring that body of people—which, however, is happily decreasing—which is inclined to pessimism on the trend of public morality. Next week I will acquaint News readers of a scandalous attack which has recently been made on the English film business by an influential publication issued in London. My offer to take up the cudgels for the trade may also prove of interest.

RECORDS OF INDIAN LIFE

Mr. Konta Thinks It Time to Take Them on Films

To the Editor of Moving Picture News:

A recent report from Sitka of the ravages of pulmonary diseases among the Indians of Alaska makes timely the question, "What is being done to preserve the records of the American natives for posterity?" The American Indian is approaching, if, indeed, he has not already reached, the last stage of his native existence. Either he is gradually disappearing, or he is adopting the white man's civilization and adapting himself to it. In both cases the records of his own civilization will be lost unless something is done and done speedily.

Much has been done, much is being done. Of this I am perfectly well aware. Explorers, missionaries, settlers, Indian fighters, army officers, and, later, scientists, have gradually accumulated a valuable volume of information. The camera has been brought into play (the series of photographs made by Edward S. Curtis for J. Pierpont Morgan practically stands first); our museums have their Indian collections, and, last of all, a beginning has been made with the phonographic registering of Indian music.

This mention of the phonograph leads me to my point, which is that we have not as yet begun to take a systematic living record of the Indian in all the phases of his life. Descriptions of it in books, drawings, and photographs are all well enough, but moving pictures would be still better. Vocabularies and grammars are indispensable, but phonographic records of vanishing tongues would be better still, even for the information of linguistic specialists. The question of the origin of the American native is as yet one of the mysteries of ethnology. We shall wish to solve it even after that native has been assimilated or has ceased to exist. And a complete set of living records may in the future prove of the greatest value in solving the problem.

When speaking of the American Indian, we in this country are apt to overlook the Indians of Canada, and, still more, those of Central and South America.

The field is too vast for private undertaking, too vast for the resources of the Modern Historic Records Association, whose chief aim is the making and preservation of just such records as these. The founding of similar associations in different parts of the world is already being discussed, but its realization will take time, and co-operation between them all still longer. Meantime, no feature of the life of the present is vanishing faster into the past than the native civilization of the American Indian, from the sub-Arctic to Patagonia.

Can not the Government at Washington, the leading power on this continent, be petitioned to put itself in communication with the other governments north and south of it for the purposes of establishing an inter-American system for the taking and preservation and exchange of the living records of the vanishing American Indians? The Modern Historic Records Association would gladly place at the service of the movement such resources as it has already at its command in the beginning of its existence.

NOT A STATE RIGHT PROPOSITION

It is a remarkable fact, that, in spite of the heavy advertising of the Powers Motion Picture Company and the space devoted to the matter by the trade papers, there still exists a misunderstanding on the part of the exhibitors throughout the country regarding the Mildred Holland, "Power Behind the Throne," two-reel release.

The letters are still coming in by the score, inquiring the State right prices for this picture play and the line of paper and advertising matter gotten out for it. The Powers people wish it distinctly understood by everyone that this film is one of their regular releases and can be booked at their regular release day figure. Any exhibitor desiring extra copies of the lobby display, etc., may obtain same by notifying the company.

MOTION PICTURE TRUST ASSAILED AS THE BOLDEST

Samuel Untermyer Says It Is Crushing Competition in Popular Entertainment—100 Concerns Wiped Out —Secures Injunction, Charging Violation of State Law—Poor May Be Greatest Sufferers

Samuel Untermyer, one of the leading corporation lawyers of the country, declared yesterday the most audacious combination in the country is the Moving Picture Trust.

"I have been devoting much research to this subject for the last few weeks," said Mr. Untermyer to a New York American reporter, "and in all my experience I have not been called on to deal with so brazen an effort ruthlessly to crush competition and monopolize a great and growing industry—one in which millions of capital are invested, and which provides entertainment and education for millions of people at prices within reach of the humblest in the land.

"But if the trust shall be permitted to have its way it will impose a cruel tax on the public by increasing the prices of admission to the tens of thousands of moving picture shows throughout the United States.

"This popular form of entertainment will be restricted to the wealthy and the well-to-do unless the Moving Picture Trust is dissolved."

Mr. Untermyer, in association with Rogers & Rogers, has instituted suit against the Trust, which will be carried to the Federal courts under the Sherman Anti-Trust law, if that course shall become necessary. At present the action is pending in the Supreme Court of New York County before Justice Ford.

Injunction Is Sought

It is in the nature of an injunction asked by the Greater New York Film Rental Company against the Motion Picture Patents Company and others. The plaintiff is fighting for its life. It is the sole survivor of about 125 companies, twenty-five of them in New York alone, which were doing a thriving business throughout the country until about a year ago, the Motion Picture Patents Company appearing as the exclusive holder of license privileges granted by the various moving picture manufacturing concerns.

Previous to the organization of the Motion Picture Patents Company anybody could obtain a license from the manufacturers to use the films and machinery upon which the Edison Company and other manufacturing corporations hold patents. These other concerns which with the Edison Company are named in the suit as defendants, are the American Mutoscope and Biograph Company, Essanay Company, Kalem Company, George Kleine, Lubin Manufacturing Company, Pathe Freres, Selig Polyscope Company and the Vitagraph Company of America.

In Defiance of Laws

"All these concerns," said Mr. Untermyer, "have combined into the Motion Picture Patents Company, in defiance of the laws of New York as well as of the Sherman statute. They not only have forced everybody except our clients out of business, but also have raised the price of the rent of the films they make from 9 cents a running foot to 11 cents. If the monopoly is permitted to have its way there is no reason why it should not increase the rental price still higher until a point is reached where the business can stand no more and the people are robbed of thousands.

"William Fox, President of the Greater New York Film Rental Company, deserves the thanks of the whole country for the brave fight he is making to save the moving picture form of entertainment for the enjoyment of the poorest as well as the wealthiest.

"Before the combination was formed there were one hundred and twenty rental agencies buying apparatus and films from the various manufacturers and engaged in leasing films and apparatus to exhibitors. About twenty-five of these agencies were here in Manhattan. Immediately after the Trust was organized the Motion Picture Patents Company refused to license many existing rental agencies and reduced the number in the United States to about seventy-five, of which number nine were in this city.

Had the Courage to Fight

"With the exception of our client, all of these seventy-five agencies have since been driven out of business through the Trust's refusal to license them any longer. Our client would have been crushed like the rest had he not had the courage to fight. His books showed his company was doing a most profitable business that represented a capitalization of at least $700,000, but when the Trust officials threatened him with the loss of the license to use its patents any longer, he was coolly told his plant and property would be bought by the Trust for about $85,000. We have proof of meetings held here in New York for the formation of the Trust. It was upon these proofs that Justice Ford granted us a temporary injunction restraining the Trust from withholding the license from the Greater New York Film Rental Company."

Whatever disposition shall be made of the proceeding now pending before Justice Ford, Mr. Untermyer says, the case probably will have to be carried to the United States Supreme Court.—New York American.

THE KINEMACOLOR PROCESS

By Wm. E. Smith, E. E.

Much has been written and said both in this country and in Europe in praise of kinemacolor pictures, and but little in reference as to how they are produced and the type of machine used to project them.

For the proper realization of the great advancement made by kinemacolor over the ordinary black and white pictures of motion photography, it must be clearly emphasized that the colors obtained are due to the agency of light only. No painting, brush work, stenciling or similar devices are employed. The colors are, as it were, lying latent in the photographic film and are brought into visibility at the moment of exhibition. In the older methods of color motion photography as employed by Pathe, Gaumont and others, colored moving pictures are obtained by the costly process of employing numerous girls to paint the pictures, a process often taking weeks to color, and even then only certain classes of subjects are capable of being dealt with. By the kinemacolor process the colors of nature are photographically recorded simultaneously with the taking of the picture; the complete picture with all its glowing richness of color can be exhibited within a few hours after taking.

In order to give a clear and comprehensive explanation as to how this is made possible we shall have to learn how still pictures are made in their natural colors; first, we shall endeavor to learn something about light; secondly, about color and the combining of light and color; thirdly, the production of pictures in their natural colors by the aid of light alone.

Light

Luminous Bodies.—Bodies, like a gas jet or the sun, which emit light of their own, are said to be luminous. Light is now believed to originate in extremely minute and rapid vibrations of the atoms of matter. These vary in rapidity from about 400 billion to about 760 billion a second. The atoms of all luminous bodies are supposed to be vibrating at this enormous rate.

When a body is heated its atoms are thrown into more and more rapid vibrations, and when their rate of vibration reaches 400 billion a second the body begins to become luminous. In the case of a candle flame or gas jet, these rapid vibrations are produced by the clashing of the atoms of oxygen, hydrogen and carbon as they rush into combination. A blacksmith may heat a nail red hot by vigorously hammering it. Each blow of the hammer throws the atoms of the nail into more rapid vibration, until they finally vibrate fast enough to develop light. The number of vibrations and the wave length determine in the case of sound, the key note, and in light, the color.

Ingenious experiments have made it possible to ascertain the number of vibrations of colored light, and it has been found that 400 billion impingments per second create the sensation of red, and that by increasing this number, we obtain the yellow, green, blue, and finally violet sensation which corresponds to 760 billion vibrations per second.

The most important source of light is the sun, and we term its light "white," while every other quantitively different sensation of light is termed "colored." Where sunlight passes through a prism of a spectroscope it is dispersed, and on a suitably placed white screen a colored band will be visible, this being the familiar spectrum. In the spectrum all variations from red to yellow, green and blue to violet are represented, and the question as to the number of colors in the spectrum, and the division of the spectrum into six or seven color bands is quite arbitrary.

We find the sensation of "white" is caused by the simultaneous action of ether waves of different wave lengths upon the retina of the eye, and further, that white light is composed of all the colored rays visible in the spectrum.

If any component is removed, the rest, although composed of different colored lights, will only impress our eye with a single color sensation. If we abstract, for instance, the green rays from white light, the remaining red, yellow, blue and violet parts will combine to form the sensation of red light. If light strikes a body it can be absorbed or reflected, or it can pass through. In most cases all three phenomena can be observed. It can, for instance, occur that the absorption is solely confined to certain wave lengths, whereas, the rest can pass or be reflected.

If the reflected rays reach our eye, they will give rise to the sensation of color; the body in question cannot appear white, because one of the components of white light is absent, it will therefore appear colored. If, for instance, a glass plate absorbs all green rays the penetrating rays will make us perceive "red." This glass we will call red, because it has absorbed the green rays. Paper coated with Eosine will appear red, because the light reflected from its surface is devoid of green rays.

If we cover the Eosine paper with a green, a red, or a blue glass plate and expose it to strong sunlight, the paper will be bleached under the green glass, and will retain its color under the other two.

This decomposition has only been caused by the green part of the white light, and the Eosine molecules are destroyed by the impinging ether waves, and we term it green sensitive.

Cyanine is orange sensitive, it bleaches only under the influence of orange rays, because it absorbs the same; chloride, iodide, and bromide of silver are blue sensitive, because they retain the blue rays and appear in the transmitted light of an orange color.

The vibration theory of light has given us the following principles which are photographically of the highest importance.

1. A substance can only be chemically altered by rays which it absorbs.
2. Not necessarily every colored body must be chemically altered by these rays.
3. Every light-sensitive substance requires a certain intensity of light for its decomposition.

Color

The Three Primary Colors.—It is found that all possible hues of color can be obtained by mixing in various proportions the three hues, red, green and violet. Hence these three hues are called the three primary colors. By mixing the hues red and green in various proportions, all the hues from red to green can be obtained. In this admixture the proportion of the red must steadily decrease and that of the green increase in passing from red to green. By a similar admixture of green and violet we can obtain all the hues that lie between the green and violet, and of violet and red, all the hues of purple which lie between the red and violet opposite the green.

Difference Between Mixing Hues and Mixing Pigments

Fill two glass cells having parallel sides, one with a solution of aniline yellow, the other with an ammoniacal solution of sulphate of copper and place each in front of a projection lantern, so as to project two colored discs on a screen. One of these will be yellow and the other blue. Turn the lanterns till the two colored discs overlap or coincide. The result will be a disc of white (Fig. 1). In this case the hues are mixed without any mixture of substance. Now mix the two solutions by pouring some of each into a third cell, place this cell before one of the lanterns. The disc on the screen will be green. The same result would be obtained were the two cells, each containing one of the solutions, placed in front of one of the lanterns so that the light from the lantern must pass through both solutions.

On analyzing, by means of a prism, the light which passes through each solution, it will be found that the yellow solution absorbs and quenches all the rays of the spectrum above the green, and the blue solution all those below the green. Green is the only color which is not absorbed by either substance. Hence, when light is allowed to pass through both substances, either by mixing them in one cell or by placing them in separate cells, one in front of the other, they absorb and quench all colors except the green, and, therefore, the disc on the screen is green. The hues of two colored substances are never blended when the substances themselves are mixed. One of the substances always absorbs and quenches a part of the rays which escape from the other.

The Theory of Color Perception.—The theory of color perception at the present time accepted by nearly all authorities is that of Young modified by Helmholtz, and sometimes called the Young-Helmholtz theory.

According to this theory there are three primary color sensations, namely, those of red, green and violet, and all our perceptions of color arise from the combinations of these three. Each minute portion of the retina is capable of receiving and transmitting these three sensations, because it is supplied with three nerve fibrils, one of which is especially adapted for the reception of each of these sensations. One set of these nerves is strongly acted upon by long waves of light, and produce the sensation of red, another set responds most powerfully to waves of medium length, producing the sensation which we call green, and finally, the third set is strongly simulated by short waves, and generates the sensation known as violet. The red of the spectrum, then, acts powerfully on the first set of these nerves; but according to the theory, it also acts upon the other two sets, but with less energy. The same is true of the green and violet rays of the spectrum; they each act on all three sets of nerves, but most powerfully on those especially designed for their reception.

Still Pictures in Their Natural Colors

Every pictorial representation endeavors to secure the nearest possible approach to nature.

Rarely is it possible to give an idea of the nature of an object by simple outline drawing, it is, therefore, shaded to give it the impression of body; and color is introduced to lend life and truth to the representation, color intensifies the illusion just as a plastic representation does.

It is certain that the first photographic picture created a desire for photographs in their natural colors, and to secure the colors of the picture as the camera sees it has always been a problem, on the solution of which men have labored since the earliest days of photography.

We can divide all experiments in this direction into two groups, first we can prepare light sensitive surfaces which retain the color of the light reflected upon them, which is called the direct method of producing photocromes.

The earliest experiments in direct color photography were originated by Becquerel, Seebeck and Pirtevin. The basis of their experiments is the property which silver sub-chloride possesses to reflect light similar in composition to that which formed it.

Lippmann was also one of the pioneer experimenters who did much to perfect the art of color photography. Lumiere deserves great credit in perfecting the autochrom plate which is constructed as follows:

Interposed between the sensitive coating and the glass is a thin layer of transparent microscopic starch grains, dyed orange-red, green and violet, spread without overlapping, mixed in such proportion that the layer appears colorless when examined by transmitted light, and absorbs but a small percentage of the light received. The sensitive coating is extremely thin, and made of a special fine-grained panchromatic emulsion. When such a plate is exposed in the camera, the glass side toward the lens, the light, before reaching the sensitive coating passes through the colored starch grains, which act individually as minute screens, each one absorbing all colors but its own. A miscroscopical selection takes place, and after development there is found under each grain a corresponding spot (reduced silver) of a density proportionate to the amount of color received and transmitted by this particular grain. Were the plates fixed at this stage, the picture when examined by transmitted light, would show only the colors complementary to those of the original, since the true colors are marked by the black spots beneath the grains. But when the reduced silver is dissolved (in the permanganate solution) the image is reversed. The opaque spot under each grain becomes transparent and transmits colored light precisely of the same hue as the light transmitted by the grain when the plate was exposed in the camera, in other words the color is reconstructed just as it was decomposed during exposure. A special yellow screen must be fitted to the lens in order to equalize the action of the light and compensate for the predominant actinism of the violet and blue rays to which the panchromatic emulsion is most sensitive.

A very original idea has been followed by Joly, of Dublin. He uses glass plates with a ruling of very thin transparent parallel lines, about 10 per millimeter. These lines are red, green and blue in color, which order is repeated, and the whole plate appears in transmitted light of a light grey color. If such a glass plate is pressed into contact with a photographic dry plate during exposure, the plate being one which is equally sensitive to all parts of the spectrum, the red rays reflected by the original can only pass through the red lines and affect the plate, which will reduce the silver in development wherever light impressed the plate. The green part of the original will be only imprinted under the green, the blue under the blue lines, whereas, the white will act through all lines. If a positive is made from this negative and viewed in contact with a similar screen, we obtain, when the two plates are in perfect register, a picture of the object in almost natural colors.

F. E. Ives' process may be briefly described as follows: By means of a very ingenious compound camera front, three photographic negatives of the object are made by simultaneous and equal exposure from the same point of view and upon the same sensitive plate.

The photographic plate is sensitive to all colors of light, but by introducing light filters one of the negatives is made by such light rays only as excite the fundamental red sensation, and in due proportion; another by light rays as they excite the fundamental green sensation; another by light rays as they excite the fundamental blue-violet sensation.

From this triple negative a triple lantern slide is made which, although it shows no color, contains such a graphic record of the natural colors that in order to reproduce them to the eye it is sufficient to superpose the three images, one with a red screen, one with a green, and one with blue-violet, by projection with a special projection lantern having three optical systems. The three images, being exactly superposed, appear as one only, in which the natural colors are exactly reproduced together with the light and shade.

We now are able to take up the question as to how motion pictures are reproduced in their natural color by means of light and photography alone.

I feel that I cannot explain this better than to quote from the patent specifications of the different experimenters in the field of natural colored motion photography.

Specification 3232. February, 1897. Ives, F. E.

Several plates, or different portions of one plate, are exposed in succession behind screens of different colors. The screens are mounted in a frame, to which the slide is attached. The frame with the screens are moved after each exposure. A motor may be fitted to the apparatus.

Specification 21649. October, 1898. Friese-Greene, W.

Producing magic lantern slides. Relates to a method of producing negatives by exposing successively through three colored screens, and then making transparencies from these for projecting in a magic lantern. A rotating screen made up of three colored sectors, representing three primary colors, is rotated rapidly behind the camera lens 7 (see Fig. 2) by means of a belt 12, and pulley 13 and 11. It is stated that the negative (N. B., not negatives) produced will produce a positive transparency, which, when placed in a magic lantern with a similar rotating screen, will project an image in natural colors on the screen. By using lenses made up of three different colored sectors, the three-colored screen may be dispensed with both in the camera and magic lantern.

Remarks: Lenses made up like this do not pass actinic light but safe light, therefore, it is impossible to take photographs with such an instrument. To swirl three different color screens in front of one lens to make one negative, as here suggested, serves no scientific purpose, but it shows that the inventor desired to adapt Ives' system without understanding it. By the additive method of color photography, it is required that one negative should be taken through each color filter, that is, three negative color records are obtained. To take three color records with this inventor's apparatus is not possible, because there are no opaque spaces to allow the plate to be changed between the separate exposures, nor does he require the photographic film to be sensitized to all colors; red or green light could, therefore, not act on the ordinary brom-silver gelatine film.

Specification 6202. March, 1899. Lee, F. M., and Turner, E. R.

Relates to kinematograph apparatus for taking and exhibiting photographs of moving objects in their natural colors. A rotary color screen being mounted on one axis. This screen is made up of a green, a red and a blue-violet sector of glass, each pair of sectors being separated by opaque bands (see Fig. 3). The velocity ratio between the screens, and the color sensitive film is such that each picture on the ribbon is taken through a color sector of different color. The positives of the various color sensations may be exhibited singly in rapid succession, or two or all of them may be superposed.

Remarks: This invention allows also the use of two-color projection, and the specification clearly states superposition by rapid succession—i. e., duping the eye by persistence of vision. The inventor does not claim originality or property in arriving at this illusion, he could not suggest it quicker than by Motor 3232, 1897 above.

The inventor based his hopes of success on a very rapid lens, F1, but the then known sensitizers scored against him. The possibility arrived only in 1902 with the introduction of orthochrom, a color sensitizer which enabled a rapid exposure through an orange-red color filter. The exposure can now be made as 2 to 1, through the orange-red or blue-violet color filter, against a former ratio of 50 to 1.

Specification 23863. November, 1899. Davidson, W. N. L.

The rotary color screens holding the different colored sectors are here mounted eccentrically in front of the usual kinematographic revolving shutter when taking the negative color records. The positive color records are dyed in the respective film colors, thus obviating rotating color filters when projecting.

Remarks: The negative color records, are, therefore, taken with a similar screen as Lee-Turner's.

Specification 249. January, 1902. Vaughan, W. F.

Relates to a kinematographic apparatus for producing pictures, and exhibiting them in natural colors. The photograph on the ribbons are taken in series of three. The colored screens form the three sectors of a rotating disc. An endless band shutter, with apertures of different width for the three colors, to regulate the exposures, revolves on pulleys.

Remarks: This is simply an exposure regulating device, and could not be worked without a license from Lee-Turner.

Specification 3729. February, 1903. Fumeaux, B., and Davidson, W. N.

A camera, by means of prisms, produces three independent images for use in tricolor photography. The camera may be used for optical projection. The prisms are placed in front of the lens.

Remarks: The invention is practically of no use for a three-color system, but with the system as shown in the illustration two color results have been obtained, and were shown in May, 1904, in Paris. To guard against double reflections and ghost pictures the objects have to be photographed before a non-reflecting dark background. It is also to be noted that absolutely sharp pictures cannot be obtained by the aid of such prisms. If the pictures are taken, say at 20 feet distance, then the projection has also to be at 20 feet, or the picture would not superpose. It is also advisable to put a light screen, LS, in front of the lens, to further separate the light cone. The light intensity as affected by a prism is shown in F (Fig. 4).

Specification 7179. March, 1904. Davidson, W. N. L.

This is a kine-mirror box, which by reflection superposes two or three color records, when such are to be projected in superposition on the screen.

Remarks: If ordinary plate glass mirrors are used, double reflection is set up by such mirrors. Substituted faced mirrors soon tarnish. The invention enables the projection of color records placed side by side and obtained by wedge shaped prism (Fig. 5).

Specification 27418. December, 1904. Davidson, W. N. L.

Placing the prisms point to point behind the lens is an improvement on 3729, 1903. The formation of double pictures is thus avoided, and no special background is required. The light dispersion to the focus is here also unequal, as shown in F. If two such pictures are superposed with the aid of color filters, then the combination picture will show more red on one side and more green on the opposite side. This is a defect inherent in all pictures formed by reflections through wedge shaped prisms (Fig. 6).

Specification 322. January, 1905. Pfenninger, O.

Placing the two prisms at the crossing point of the light rays in a lens combination is claimed as the best position.

Remarks: This formation is undoubtedly the best, but also the most expensive to mount. It gives the sharpest picture, but still not absolutely sharp, and the irregular light action (seen in the drawings), shown in projection as irregular coloration, is also not obviated (Fig. 7).

Specification 9465. April, 1905. Friese-Greene, W.

One picture taken direct through the lens, and one picture deflected with the aid of one prism placed behind the lens, is claimed as an improvement on the other three prism systems.

Remarks: The picture taken direct is, of course, sharp, but the other one will be in a different focus, and will be rendered less sharp than in any of the other prism forms, because a prism with stronger dispersing power has to be employed. The light intensity of the prism focus picture, PF, and the lens focus picture, LF, are shown in the drawing (Fig. 8).

Specification 3766. February, 1906. Fumeaux, B.

If it is desired to superpose by projection three positive color records which are placed side by side, two Wrenham prisms are recommended. These prisms have to be calculated for certain distances, and are mounted facing each other in front of the outer lenses (Fig. 9).

Specification 25908. November, 1906. Pfenninger, O.

This is a mirror box in which the three light paths are compensated by refracting material so as to make all the light paths the same length for the light rays coming from one optical center and forming in the focussing plan three negative color records of the same size.

The obtained positive color records are then projected and superposed to form one color picture. Obviously color filters have to be inserted where necessary.

Specification 26671. December, 1906. Smith, G. A., and Urban, C.

To obtain kinematograph pictures in natural colors successive pictures on the film are first obtained by photography alternatively through two color filters, as red and green (Fig. 10).

On projecting, similar filters are employed, with the result that two differently colored series are thrown upon the screen. The rate of projection is about twice that ordinarily employed, so that successive pictures in each series fuse visually by persistence of vision.

Specification 17726. July, 1907. Pfenninger, O.

Three-color records placed side by side are superposed by this invention. Two Wrenham prisms are mounted facing each other, and to balance the difference in focal length, refracting material is inserted between the prisms. The combination can be employed with a projector having one lens or two or three lenses, therefore, two-color records only and also three-color records placed side by side on a film or plate can be superposed, forming one picture in colors. The color filters are placed where most convenient (Fig. 11).

Specification 453. January, 1908. Davidson, W. N. L.

To produce animated pictures in their natural colors, color screens, in the form of an endless band, travel with the film.

Remarks: This seems to be a band of the same length as the photographic film and is, therefore, not endless. If 3,000 feet of color pictures are shown 3,000 feet of color band is required.

Specification 11791. May, 1908. Friese-Greene, W.

To take three-color kinematograph pictures, a traveling band, running with the ribbon is recommended. The traveling band is colored with the three primary colors and the extent of each color strip is equal to the area of the sensitized film affected during the exposure. A similar colored traveling band is employed when projecting the positives.

Remarks: This is really a circular band which has to be hoisted aside of the lens in front (Fig. 12).

Specification 5945. March, 1909. Pfenninger, O.

This color movement is formed by color discs, each color disc is cut out to some extent to allow the light to pass. Two discs superposed, form in some parts light safe places, which act the same way as opaque spaces. The two color discs, say in green and orange, can be revolved together on one axis or separate on two axes. There is also introduced a third color disc, which, only if so desired, comes into action at intervals only. The device is the same for taking or projecting (Fig. 13).

The reader will have learned after carefully reading over the foregoing specifications that the only practical process in operation is that of kinemacolor in Specification 26671, December, 1906, Smith, G. A., and Urban, C. Which reads as follows:

To obtain kinematograph pictures in natural colors, successive pictures on the film are first obtained by photography alternatively through two color filters, as red and green, and etc., etc.

In working out the process, one of the most difficult problems was that of making a photographic film that was sufficiently sensitive to red light.

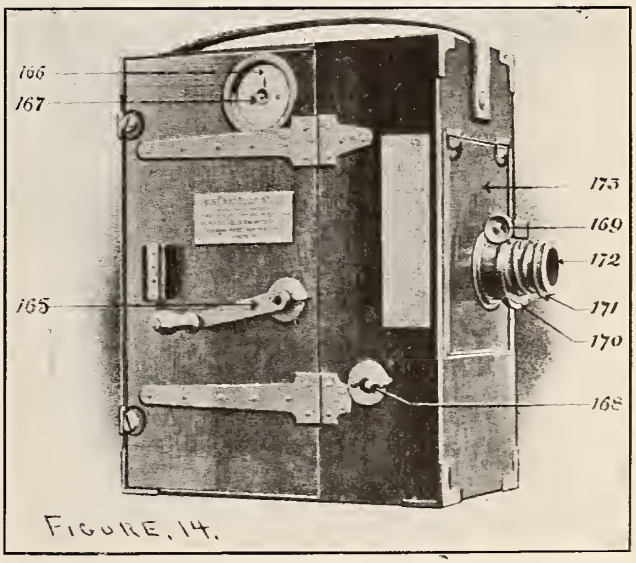
As explained in the beginning of this article the ordinary monochrom film is not sensitive to red rays, and only slightly to yellow and green rays. For that reason a red light can be used in the dark room to watch the development of the ordinary black and white negatives. In the development of kinemacolor negatives the operator cannot even have the red light. The making of a color sensitive film necessitated exhaustive experiments covering over a period of nearly three years, but finally a product was obtained which in ordinary sunlight is sensitive to color waves from the brightest of violets to the darkest of reds. Since the introduction of the starch grain system of color photography, as mentioned herein, numerous enquirers have questioned whether this system now adapted to the glass plate, could not also be applied to motion photography.

The answers is as follows:

1. It is impossible to apply the starch grains or the fine rulings to celluloid in lengths suitable for motion pictures.

2. For the kinematograph, one thirty-second of a second is the longest exposure that can be given, even if only the regulation of 16 pictures per second be taken (kinemacolor requires 32 pictures per second). One second per picture is the best than can be done in the brightest sunlight with the starch grain system.

3. It is doubtful whether a duplicate could be made from the original negative by the starch grain process.



The Kinemacolor Camera

The illustration shown in Fig. 14 shows the operating side of the camera, with crank, film index, and lens in position for securing natural color pictures. Fig. 15 shows the camera with the lens panel removed showing the color filter and light cut-off shutter.

The color filter is geared to make one revolution to two pictures, thereby giving alternate exposures through the red and green screens, the light in each instance being cut off by the obliterating shutter, which makes one revolution to one picture. It will, therefore, be seen that the ratio of speed is one-half of the color filter to one of the obliterating shutter.

The Kinemacolor Projector

We now come to the machine used for the projection of kinemacolor pictures. Most of us are familiar with the ordinary motion picture machine and know that it consists of an arc lamp, lamp house, rheostats, magazines, and the head or mechanism. The kinemacolor projector has all of these, the head or mechanism varying somewhat from the types we are familiar with; this being the most important part of the projector, I shall confine my talk to the mechanism.

The Mechanism

Fig. 16 shows the gate open, the automatic or fire shutter open, and the color filter removed.

This picture is introduced primarily to show the interior of the gate, which is so constructed that, by reason of the film traveling between steel runners, the face of the film on either side does not come in contact with any part of the gate.

In order to reduce the wear and tear of perforations, the necessary gate pressure is spread over a very large area by means of three adjustable pressure bars on each side of the film. Greater retardation is obtained by employing as many pressure bars as possible, in preference to the usual method of one pressure bar only on each side, which, to produce equal arresting power, would require more pressure than does the multiple base method, operating over a similar length of film.

The steel pressure bars are hardened and burnished, and pressure can easily be adjusted by thumb-nuts on the reverse side of the gate.

Running vertically between the pressure bars are two brass plates, termed "baffle plates," whose function is as much as possible to reduce the air space around the film.

This, coupled with the totally enclosed gate, renders the firing of film in the gate an absolute impossibility.

If the film in the exposure hole should fire from any cause whatever, one picture only can be burned, the perforations themselves remaining intact, so that even rethreading the machine is unnecessary.

The gate, when closed, is securely locked by the spring catch on the top of the left sprocket, and is constructed so that it can easily be opened without fouling the color shutter.

The automatic light cut-off is shown depressed. It is connected to the governor by means of the link and governor rod.

For the purpose of illustration, the governor is shown raised.

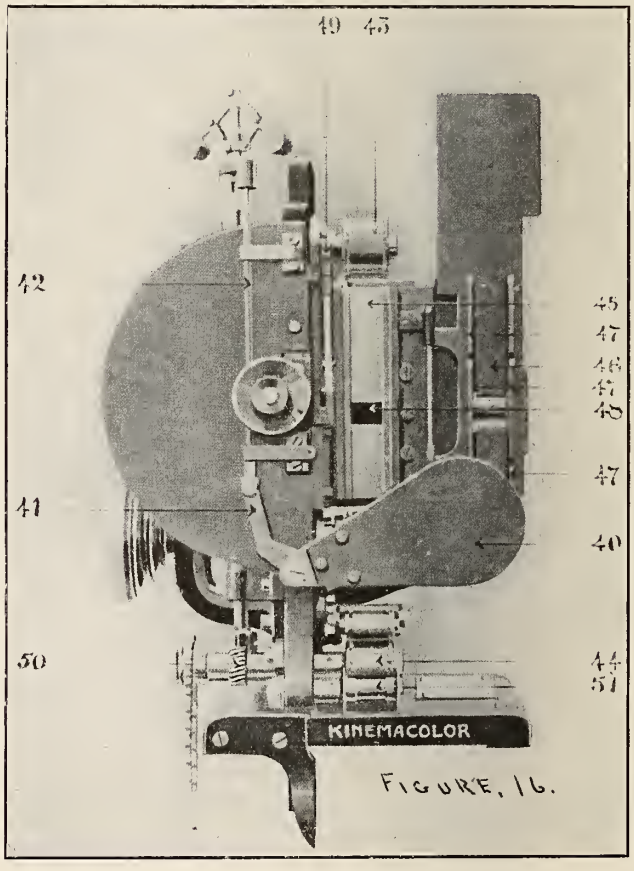
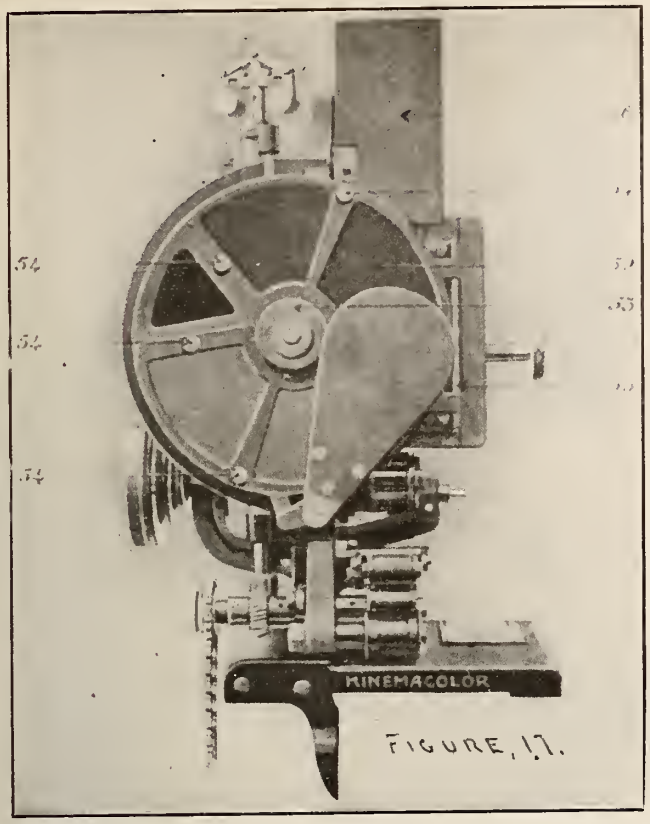
The triangular section on the left of the filter, appearing black, is actually an open space, made for purpose of lightness, through which the projecting light is free to pass, but is prevented from reaching the screen by the obliterating shutter which revolves in synchronism inside the gate.





The fire, or automatic, shutter is raised, completely intercepting the beam of light, thus protecting both the colored gelatines and the film at the same time.

A SATISFACTORY CONDITION

Moving day has come to the Nicholas Power Co., manufacturers of Powers Cameragraph. For fourteen years this concern has been located at 115-117 Nassau street, from time to time adding extra rooms to their suite of offices as the necessities of business demanded, with factory at 20 Jacob street.

Pressure of business has forced them to seek larger quarters, and factory and office are now combined in the modern fireproof building at No. 90 Gold street, where they are possessed of every modern convenience and are employing a factory force of over 200 men.

The moving picture business is advancing with giant strides and the Nicholas Power Co. always manages to keep abreast of the times.

Mr. Coles tells us that they have been swamped with orders, but with their increased facilities, they hope soon to be caught up.

Basin, Wyo.—Mr. Kingsbury and Mr. Smith will open a moving picture theatre in Fraternity Hall.

Pueblo, Colo.—Frank L. Goff, capitalist, will erect a new theatre at 219-21 West Sixth street, at a cost of $60,000.

THE FAIR-HAIRED, LILY-PURE GENEVIEVE RECEIVING REPRIMAND FOR HER ATTEMPTED ELOPEMENT WITH CAPT. CHRISTIAN

BOTH HOODED KNIGHT AND MONK AWAITING THE LAST CONSOLING WORDS FROM THE CARDINAL, BEFORE THEIR MARCH UP TO THE EXECUTION BLOCK

THE MARGRAVE'S DAUGHTER

Gaumont's Release, April 6

In the year of 1408, back during the days of mediæval chivalry, when knighthood was in the zenith of its flower, lived a stern and honorable nobleman, known throughout the realm as the Margrave of Hess. High was his social rank and wealthy was he in the large number of tenants who tilled his soil, constituted his own individual army and bowed in homage at the slightest smile or frown of his countenance. But one daughter, named Genevieve, did he possess, and such was his pride that he deemed her too good for the hand of a prince. Rare as a lily was the beauty of the Margrave's daughter and many were the knights of all ranks and station that sued for her hand in marriage.

Of all who sought her heart, Genevieve cared only for Captain Christian, a soldier of the most chivalrous courage and dauntless valor, yet the pride and honor of the stern, inexorable parent prevented him from consenting to the man of his daughter's selection. So enraged was the Margrave at the intrepid captain, that he condemned him to exile for having presumed to ask the hand of his cherished daughter.

With dolor did the fair and radiant Genevieve learn of the sentence proclaimed against her lover, and passionately did she implore for mercy from her inexorable father. He only upbraided her for her stand and chided her for her foolish lovelorn sentiment. But love, begot of so noble hearts as beat in the bosoms of two such noble persons, refused to be thwarted by the bitter commands of the powerful Margrave, so that many was the clandestine meeting 'neath castle arch, behind tower wall, or in the shadow of the overhanging vine enthatched parapets, where Genevieve and Christian pledged each other's heart and vowed to steal away by night to eternal freedom from parental yoke and to imperishable happiness.

All details were arranged, and in the gathering dusk of one fair summer's eve, the watchful Christian carried his note of directions to the room where Genevieve was to await him. His note laid on the table, he hastened back to the postern gate, where his love would meet him just as the last rays of the full, red setting sun sank behind the ivy-covered castle tower. His hopes beat high, his heart leaped with the bounds of elation, and his manly face flushed high beneath the visor of his hood, as he saw the dainty Margrave's daughter secretly making her way to the appointed place where two impetuous snorting steeds are waiting to carry them off to the happy land of marriage. As they meet, they lovingly embrace and mount, about to make escape from the confines of the castle wall, when suddenly a troop of well-armed Margrave's knights intercept them and battle both into submission. Long and untiringly, does the outnumbered Christian fight against overwhelming odds, but ere he gains the further side of the bridge that spans the moat, his battle-axe and spear have been broken and he is taken prisoner, while the anguished fairhaired Genevieve is led to the precincts of her father's chamber to receive the reprimands necessarily forthcoming for an offense so grave and grievous. So bitterly does the maiden lament the capture of her love, that her father finds words of wrath useless, but resolutely confirms his decision that Genevieve and Christian shall not wed and that he and his ancient family have but one name and one honor. The overwrought hysterical recalcitrant is led from the hall by sympathetic hands, while the sorely touched father wends his way slowly through the large, arched corridors to the tribunal chamber, where severe and sinister judges are passing sentence upon the hapless Christian. The verdict rendered is death and resignedly does the victim respond to a sentence that spreads terror to the hearts of all assembled except the fearless Captain. With the utmost of composure, is he led to his dungeon cell, where a monk, his confessor, is to be the only soul allowed admission.

At the hour of the execution, when all hope seems lost, the supposed monk enters the dark, poorly-lighted cell and stands in pious attitude while carefully scrutinizing lest any one be near. Assured of privacy, the monk unveils and there stands the lily-pure and queenly-fair Genevieve. The joyous Christian holds his love in fond embrace and is content to be beheaded on the block now that his darling bride is at his side. Quickly the pair transfer clothes, whereby the man becomes the holy monk while she the martyred knight. Soldiers conduct the hooded pair to the execution block, where heralds proclaim the blast that rends the castle air both loud and clear, advising all that the hour of doom has come for one who so boldly presumed to ask the hand of the daughter of the Margrave of Hess. The latter with his retinue of well-garbed guards, returns by means of trumpet the signal for the execution.

The executioner unhoods the victim when lo! the monk unmasks as well, and there stands the dauntless pair, the interlocked Genevieve and Christian. With the defiance characteristic of two such noble martyrs, they lay their two heads together on the self-same block.

The axe-man holds his stroke, and with eyes choked with surprise, and face aghast with horror at the situation confronting him, looks up to the balcony, whence the imperial margrave beholds the ceremonies. Simultaneously does he realize the meaning of the deed, and with faltering voice overcome with silent though unwilling admiration proclaims the daring couple man and wife, concluding with the famous never dying words: "Such love must be forgiven."

PROTECT THIS LUCRATIVE BRANCH OF THE SHEET METAL INDUSTRY

The recent legislation in several states, eliminating or restricting the use of sheet metal in various forms of fireproof construction, emphasizes the imperative need of organized effort on the part of sheet metal operators and sheet metal manufacturers for concerted action for protection. As previously referred to in these columns, the latest instance of such adverse legislation is the passage of a law by the New York State Legislature, effective July 24, 1911, providing that the apparatus for the projecting of moving pictures shall be enclosed in a booth or enclosure constructed of iron framework, covered or lined with asbestos board, or with some equally strong and fire-resisting material. Following this, an ordinance, known as the Folk ordinance, has been introduced into the Board of Aldermen, of New York City, providing that "apparatus for projecting motion pictures shall be enclosed in a booth or enclosure constructed so as to be fireproof, in accordance with the specifications of Chapter 756 of the Laws of 1911, provided, however, that no booth or inclosure constructed wholly of iron shall be permitted (the black face is the editor's). A public hearing was held before a committee of the Board of Aldermen on January 27th, at which representatives of the sheet metal trade appeared and argued strongly against the adoption of the ordinance. L. O. Morny, for The Sheet Metal Shop, in opposing the ordinance, pointed out the fire-resisting qualities of sheet metal and cited examples of where motion picture booths constructed entirely of sheet metal, with cement flooring, had successfully confined the fire caused by the ignition of films within the inclosure of the booth without panic in the audience. In one case the show was under way again within thirty minutes. It is confidently expected that this ordinance will fail of adoption. Meanwhile, at the instance of The Sheet Metal Shop, a bill is being drafted to present to the State Legislature looking to a revision of the state law so that the use of sheet metal in such construction shall be compulsory.

A number of instances might be cited of legislative action against the use of sheet metal as a fire-resisting building material, but it is sufficient to point out that eight states have enacted legislation prohibiting the use of sheet metal in the construction of motion picture booths. It is the better part of wisdom to take some organized steps for protection before the encroachments become more extensive and correspondingly difficult and expensive to resist.

Sheet metal organizations throughout the country are urged to call the attention of their state representatives to the necessity for the repeal of such legislation where it has been enacted into law, such states being New York, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Maine, Vermont, Connecticut and Rhode Island, and in all other states to be alert to resist these unjust encroachments upon their field.—"The Sheet Metal Shop."

ANCIENT ROME'S MOVING PICTURE CRAZE

Are you aware of the fact that ancient Rome had a moving picture craze, such as we have now, with the familiar accompaniments of indignation and denunciation from divers business and moral interests? Ferrero, the Italian historian, tells us of it.

The "pantomime" was the ancient Roman moving picture. And if we except the fact that the moving pictures that pleased Rome and put the business of the regular theatres in a bad way were produced by men and women and not machines, the parallel between the two crazes is complete.

The Roman moving pictures were introduced from Syria, the home of the art, by two enterprising amusement promoters named Bathyllus and Pylades. That form of entertainment had previously been unknown in Rome, but it became almost immediately popular. Great crowds flocked to see the pantomimists represent some story from Greek mythology, usually sensual, while the regular drama languished painfully.

The great charm of this style of moving picture was that it required little intellectual effort to enjoy the entertainment. All one needed was a pair of eyes. It was admirably adapted to the "tired business man." The spectator had only to watch the fugitive details, which might be forgotten almost immediately.

But no sooner had this importation from Syria begun to crowd the regular drama than there was a great outcry. Authors and regular actors protested against it unceasingly. Persons of reputation—possibly the counterpart of the sociological reformers of our day—protested against it on grounds of indecency as well as art.

It happened that just at that time there was a large coterie of educated people who were trying to do in a general way about what the backers of the "Drama Players" in our own city have set about. They were attempting to revive the theatre of Ennius, Naevius, Accius, Pacuvius, Caccillus, Plautus and Terence—to uplift the drama, in a word. The moving picture craze interfered fearfully with their plans and this caused them to condemn it unsparingly.

In spite of the opposition, however, the Roman moving picture business retained its popularity. Finally the critics of the new style of entertainment appealed to Augustus Caesar, the Emperor, pretty much as our local critics occasionally call on the mayor to stop the moving picture nuisance. But Augustus was at that time busy in Asia Minor and had no time to attend to the matter. So the moving picture business more than held its own.

The mechanism of producing an entertainment that appeals chiefly to the eye—that provides a succession of scenes readily taken in and enjoyed—has, of course, changed. But the style of entertainment is the same. Rome had her moving picture shows, with the familiar modern accompaniments.—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

A new ailment has been discovered among those who frequent the moving picture theatres. It has been given the name of moving pictureitis. 'Tis epidemic among certain young men and women who have canceled their subscriptions to the Clipper and Mirror and are subscribing for The Moving Picture News. There is an epidemic in the Western States among those ambitious to become moving picture actors. It looks easy. It isn't. The editor of this department receives many letters every week from those, principally women, who want to get a position to act before the moving picture camera. The thought of having thousands of people admire their animated picture upon the screen every day is alluring, and with such qualifications as being able to ride a horse, swim, play tennis, dance, and, in some cases, self-confessed beauty, they want to know the way to get into a moving picture stock company.

Those who never had experience on the stage are the most confident that, if given a trial in some studio, they would make an instantaneous hit. "I have a more impressive personality than Miss So-and-so," or "I know that I can act more convincingly than Mr. Jenkins, of the Bright Light Film Company," are frequent assertions contained in epistles received constantly from Miss Jones, of Kokomo, or Mr. Ambitious of Cedar Rapids.

Answering collectively many inquiries received, it is stated once and for all that no Correspondence School can turn out a successful moving picture actor. Save your money and postage on the moving-picture-actor-correspondence-school idea. A majority of the actors and actresses whose familiar faces you see every day on the screens have won their spurs through heart-breaking work. The majority of these artists have been affiliated with the "legitimate theatre," before joining the "movies." Many of them have won fame behind the footlights and have had years of experience before joining the moving picture stock companies. Another reason why the amateur would have no opportunity to shine as a member of a film stock company is that there are thousands of capable and experienced actors and actresses right now without engagements. Many of them are on the waiting lists of the various moving picture concerns. Is it likely that the Director would turn to some unknown when he can select a versatile actor or actress for his stock company merely by stepping to the telephone?

Miss Ella Eichert, of the Bison Stock Company, has been visiting recently in Cleveland, Ohio. She has been besieged by girls ambitious to become moving picture actresses. She was interviewed and she told of some of the actual hardships of the work of a moving picture stock actress. If other film companies would take a page from Essanay and send a member of their company on a lecture tour, explaining the talent necessary for moving picture work, it would prove an actual benefaction to the many who believe they could step into a studio and assume the leading rôles in picture plays. Such methods would also probably check the influx of appeals received by every manufacturer and the editor of every journal devoted to the interests of cinematography.

We read an editorial in some journal recently that the moving picture show was causing the public library to become deserted. The writer took the attitude that the former indefatigable reader was leaving his books because he could enjoy the classical and popular novel so much better on the screen.

We believe that cinematography really stimulates the cause of good literature. Many devotees of the "six best sellers" visit the picture theatres and view Dante's "Inferno," "Enoch Arden," "Vanity Fair," "David Copperfield," etc., and immediately are desirous of reading the book or poem. George W. Fuller, librarian of the Public Library, Spokane, Wash., proves the above theory in a recent statement in which he asserts that moving picture shows stimulate a desire for reading which finds expression in an increased patronage of the public library of which he is in charge.

"There has been a marked increase in the demand for 'Dante,'" said Fuller, "since the Inferno pictures have been introduced in this country." Mr. Fuller further states that the pictures do not keep the children away from the libraries, but on the contrary, since pictures became popular, the demand for a higher class of juvenile literature has shown a marked increase.

The writer has personally investigated this subject and has interviewed many librarians of smaller Carnegie libraries in various sections of the country. Without exception, those in charge believe that the reading of high-class literature is fostered by the picture play, and it is also asserted that the "blood-and-thunder" novel or "penny dreadful" had been hit a hard blow. It is argued that the Western picture has been instrumental in making the "penny dreadful" rather unpopular among the juvenile population. Here at last is a good word for the "Cowboy" and "Indian" picture, for if "Westerns" have caused a decrease in the circulation of issues of "Bleary-Eyed Mike, the Terror of the Gulch," they have not been released in vain.

From the above investigations, it will be readily seen that if manufacturers continue to release high-class pictures, taken from classical and standard literature, cinematography will be further credited with contributing to the educational welfare of the people.

Here is a piece of good news from Minnesota: Nearly all of the 600 members of the Guild of Catholic Women of St. Paul, Minn., have signed this pledge, circulated by the new civic department of the Guild: "I pledge myself to remain away from all places of amusement where the standard of morality is not the highest. It is not necessary that I take such a pledge, but I hope by so doing to influence others to do likewise; also to try to influence others to attend anything commendable."

This is recognizing the difference between the decent and the indecent drama, and a pledge to give no countenance to the latter. It is a great movement and calculated to do a community more good than other reforms that are mighty in proclamation and insignificant in action. There are many good show towns, and that is all right, but it needs go forth that any city or town doesn't want any rank or indecent shows, whether of high society or low. There is nothing that detracts so from the moral tendencies of a community as a dirty show, be it picture play or otherwise. It is hoped that the women everywhere, in the pride of their virtue and honor, will imitate the action of their sisters in Minneapolis. The members of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League know of the demand for clean shows, and are doing all in their power to uphold the standard. A majority of the manufacturers are helping along the cause of morality and uplift of cinematography. However, there remains the fact that the shady story is occasionally released to the detriment of the entire industry. Stop it!

When President Taft took up his gold pen to sign the proclamation admitting Arizona to the Union, the click of shutters and the whirr of three picture machines marked time with the scratching of the pen.

According to a table prepared by the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian church, 11 per cent of the inhabitants of these United States attend moving picture theatres. According to the table, baseball comes first with 29 per cent, socials and picnics second, pool and billiards third, and picture shows fourth.

The moving picture philosopher remarks: "I think there should be a censorship board tu pass on theatrical shows jest as there is over movin' pictures. An' the theatrical board should be th' heaviest board ev th' two."

NOTES OF THE WEEK

There are always two sides to every question, and there is also a happy medium at which both sides can blend their conclusions with reason. This seems to be the case in the difference of opinion between Mayor William P. Connery, of Lynn, Mass., and Miss Flora Pope, assistant superintendent of schools of that city.

Miss Pope asserts that too much "moving picture" is morally and mentally harmful to children and weakens their powers of concentration. Says she: "The question is often asked, 'Where should children go?' I believe that they should go to bed at night, and go out and play in the good fresh air every afternoon. I am only stating results in the school room, results that have become very noticeable and very alarming."

Mayor Connery, who has taken up the matter, gives as his opinion the following statement:

"Children who frequent the moving picture shows are for the most part those who have no pianos and nothing to interest them in their homes. They have no back yards in which to play. I believe that a great number of these moving pictures have a great educational advantage for such children, aside from amusing them.

"Of course, some of the children of the pink tea and silk stocking brigade do not attend such moving picture shows, but let me say in all frankness that these children of the five o'clock tea people do not always make the greatest men and women. We have got to have moving picture shows to save our boys and girls from becoming mollycoddles."

Undoubtedly both are right in a sense. Too much of a good thing is always harmful, and it is possible that constant attendance of nervously inclined children at moving picture theatres where a varied program of pictures is given has a tendency to excite and unsettle.

On the other hand, children who have neither pianos nor anything else to interest them in their homes, can find much more harmful amusement than that of going to a picture show. And the anticipated evening up of matters in Lynn by admitting the children to not more than two afternoon performances a week, barring them from evening performances, will be a happy result of an exchange of opinions on the subject.

What could be more significant of the wonderful future in store for the moving picture business than the following statement cabled to the Chicago Daily News from Vienna, Austria:

"All the proprietors and managers of operas, theatres and variety cabarets in Vienna have united in an angry protest against the cinematograph theatres, the unrestricted competition of which threatens to drive the older places of entertainment into bankruptcy. The public is no longer going to the opera or the theatre. Even the Imperial Court Opera and the Imperial Hofburg Theatre frequently are half empty."

For the first time in the history of the American Navy the torpedo fleet division of the Pacific fleet were specially engaged in a series of maneuvers for motion pictures. Orders for this drill were given by Secretary of the Navy George L. von Meyer. Permission to take the pictures was secured by Fred D. Halliday, Secretary of the Annex Motion Picture Company, of San Diego, which maintains a laboratory at National City. Halliday secured 1,200 feet of pictures which have been developed and are ready for shipment to Washington, where they are to be inspected by Secretary von Meyer in person before they are released for production.

The arrest of Victor Weiss, an employee of the General Film Company, of 219 Sixth avenue, so unnerved him that he confessed yesterday to the detectives who captured him the systematic pilfering of film reels which he had carried on for a month or more, and enabled the plainclothes men to arrest the two men by whom he said he was retained to carry on the thefts.

Magistrate O'Connor held Weiss in $1,000 bail for trial on a charge of grand larceny, and his two accomplices, Isaac Picker and Abraham Levi, in $2,500, charged with being receivers of stolen property.

Alfred Weiss, his employer and manager of the company, charged him with having stolen a film valued at $100. Weiss insisted that he had been egged on to the series of petty thefts by Picker and Levi, who, he said, would give him an itemized statement of the films they wanted and leave him to "fill the order." His usual compensation, he added, was from $7 to $10 for each film he delivered.

"More is learned by children, and grown people, too, for that matter, in the moving picture theatre than can be learned in school," said W. A. McKeever, professor of philosophy in the Kansas State Agricultural College. "This being the case, the motion pictures should become a source of education instead of merely a means of amusement. Introduce the moving picture into church and school work."

The following, copied from the Toronto, Ontario, News, is much too amusing to be omitted.

A late sensation in Berlin, Germany, is the belated appearance of the Johnson-Jeffries fight pictures at the leading cinematograph theatre.

They have been exhibited for the first time after the promoters had been wrestling with the police authorities for over a year in a vain attempt to obtain a permit.

The argument which finally availed to overcome the official objections is calculated to add to the gayety of nations.

A careful examination of the films showed that among the tens of thousands of spectators gathered at the ringside only one solitary policeman was in sight. This made a deep impression upon the censorship authorities. They decided that any exhibition which was sufficiently orderly to be supervised by a single policeman, must, beyond doubt, be decent and respectable, and the ban upon the pictures was forthwith lifted.

It is estimated that the population of Houston, Texas, pay a half a million dollars to moving picture theatres yearly, supporting thereby an expenditure for the operation of said theatres of from $300,000 to $350,000 per annum.

Says Mr. F. T. Montgomery, president and general manager of the Montgomery Amusement Company, regarding the plans for conducting the new Majestic Theatre, which was opened by that company in Dayton, Ohio, on Fifth and Jefferson streets, March 4th:

B. B. Reisinger, traveling musical director of the amusement company, will direct the orchestra. Mr. Montgomery stated that the pictures to be shown will depict travel and other educational features, with enough of Western attractions to give a change. Operas and classical music will be featured. At times, he stated, the orchestra will be composed of a dozen pieces.

One feature will be the attention given patrons. In the afternoon ushers and other employees who come in contact with patrons will be attired in Tuxedo suits, while evening dress will be worn during the evening performances.

"We will be foremost in any civic movement and stand ready at any time to co-operate with the Chamber of Commerce in movements for the betterment of the city."

Dr. Anna L. Strong, recently delivered in a moving picture theatre at Louisville, Ky., a lecture on child welfare exhibits illustrated with motion pictures of the exhibit held in Chicago at the Colliseum. The place was packed to capacity.

One of the most striking features of the films shown was the reproduction of a procession of babies, passing in a seemingly endless stream beneath a symbolic figure of Death, holding the fatal scythe. As the scythe descended upon every fourth baby, the little figures dropped into an open grave. The figure was designed to show that the death of every fourth baby is due to a preventable disease.

From the Daily Consular and Trade Reports comes the following interesting note on the manufacture of celluloid in Japan:

The Sakai Celluloid Company completed the construction of its works and plant some months ago. Since that time the engineer in charge, an American, has been engaged in teaching the workmen the operation of the plant and the manufacture of celluloid. None of these workmen, all of whom are Japanese, has had any experience in this industry.

Samples of the goods, which appear to be of excellent quality, have been sent out to dealers and sales will be begun shortly. Although the producing capacity of the works is 1½ tons daily, for the present only 1 ton per day will be manufactured. The engineer in charge reports that the plant, which is said to be the most modern of its kind in any country, works most admirably, but the future success of the enterprise will depend entirely upon the close adherence of the workmen to the methods in which they have been instructed after they are no longer under foreign expert superintendence.

"The movement on in this city among the good women engaged especially in the 'child-welfare' cause, means to emphasize the demands the mothers of the country are everywhere making upon every agency having to do with child life, that it not only educate the mind, but that it be employed in giving the growing youth purer and saner views of life and service. The picture show has, within a few years, become one of the most attractive pastimes for children, and for that reason the women of the country are becoming more sensible of its potential influence for good or bad in forming the character of the child. As one teacher has said: "The moving picture makes a tremendous impression, for it reaches the mind through one of the most persuasive senses—sight." In fact, it has become a recognized fact that this latter-day invention is to become a potent factor in the early education of coming generations of the race.

THE MAN FROM THE WEST

Imp Drama of March 18, 1912

This is a Western picture of a different type to what the moving picture public has been ever accustomed to. It is Western only in so far as the principal character is concerned.

He comes down to New York with all his breezy Western freshness thick upon him, with much money and the reputation of seeking a wife. His friends and relatives plan a wife for him, and they having the veneer of Eastern civilization, choose one of their own kind.

But Steve, the man from the West, has other ideas. He is not a man to allow his liberty, the most valuable asset of his life, to be bartered away, and when he sees the plump and pretty cook, and, moreover, when he tastes the excellent pies which she makes, he is, in the best sense of the term, a lost man. He loses his heart to the cook and defies the scheme of his relatives.

But his heart is in the right place. The girl who was selected for his wife-to-be was not entirely disappointed. She and her fiancée receive from Steve a handsome wedding gift.

King Baggot plays the man from the West. Vivian Prescott is the cook, and William Shay has the part of the lover who marries the girl whom Steve does not marry.

THE WATERMAN'S BRIDE

Adapted from Gaumont "American" Synopsis

By VIRGINIA WEST

His name was Bill Sands. He was not young and he looked older than he was. Much exposure to wind and sun and rain had browned and seamed his skin, and on the temples his hair was a little gray. His eyes had the look of the eyes of a dog—faithful to the duty that he knew, questioning, yearning, and at times, behind and mingled with the other expression, a promise of defiance, when need be.

This waterman had pulled a canal boat along its watery path day in and day out for many a year. It never occurred to him that he might do anything else. He knew the duties of attending to a canal boat for he had been born to them. Besides, the boat was his home. In winter sometimes it was pretty cold, but when the spring came he could lie on the flat top and see the stars and hear the water lapping the sides of his home.

The winter had been long and cold and the waterman had been able to take his boat from its moorings but a few times. But now the ice had broken and the banks were spongy with the melting frost. The wind brought tidings of warmer days and over the roof, now and again, there flashed a spot of blue or red, heralds on joyous wings. The boatman knew that spring had come.

Six weeks later all the world rejoiced. As the waterman plodded along his task seemed lighter. He scarcely thought of it at all. On every tree and bush the birds sang and in every field the grain sprouted. Everything was full of life. The water in the canal was clear as crystal and through its clearness could be seen even the fish and little wiggling tadpoles delighting in the fast-warming water.

The man saw these things and wondered and into his eyes came more strongly the look of yearning.

Among the bushes on the bank along which he trudged there flashed a spot of red. The waterman stopped. He thought it must be a cardinal flitting there, and instinctively he hesitated to startle it.

Slowly he moved toward it, and suddenly he stopped. The red he had seen was the sleeve of a young girl. She was seated on the bank, her bare feet in the water, and in her hand she held a rude fishing pole. Her sunbonnet hung backward on her neck and her bright hair glistened in the sun.

The man stood still, leaning forward yet as he pulled on the taut rope.

The girl turned and looked up at him. The expression on her face was very serious, but it seemed to the man that he had never seen anything so lovely.

"You look warm, why don't you rest? it's fine and cool here."

The girl spoke without the least coquetry as she sat looking up into the waterman's face.

"I reckon you find that boat pretty heavy, don't you?" she continued.

"Yes."

"Well, can't you rest a little?"

"Why, I—I reckon I could."

He did not move.

"Don't you want to sit down?"

"I—I reckon so."

Hesitatingly the man tied the rope to a stump, and as hesitatingly seated himself some distance from the girl. For several minutes nothing was said. Then:

"Fishin'?"

"Yep."

"Cetch anything?"

"Not yet."

Silence again for some time before the conversation continued. This time the girl began it.

"D'you live on the boat?"

"Yep."

"How long you lived on her?"

"I never lived nowheres else."

"D'you like it?"

"I reckon."

"I wisht I could live on a canal boat."

There was absolute unconsciousness in the girl's remark.

"Have you got any folks?" the man asked.

"I ain't got no folks of my own. I live with my stepmaw's folks."

The pole dropped and she sat gazing across the canal. The man sat watching her. A tear crept slowly down her cheek and she gave it an impatient brush with her sleeve. She turned to her companion and said in frank explanation without apology:

"My paw died last fall."

Tears sprang to the man's eyes as he looked at her. He wanted to say something and he didn't know how.

"What's the matter?" she asked.

"Nothin', only I—I wisht yer paw hadn't died, somehow."

The girl drew her feet from the water and tucked them under her dress. Then she turned toward the man.

"If I was stronger I'd go 'way somewheres. But I can't on account o' my heart."

"What's wrong with it?" he asked, almost anxiously.

"I dunno. It takes spells. The folks says it's just airs so's I won't have to do no work."

"What d'you do 'ith yourself?"

"Oh, I can't do much. I'd ruther tend the garden than anything, but when I do, something jest grabs me right in the side. I ain't no good at nothin'."

The man moved uneasily. A thought was forming vaguely in his mind but he could not give it expression.

"I wisht you was strong," was all he said.

She looked at him wonderingly. "Why?" she said.

He pulled a handful of grass and dropped it slowly through his fingers before he spoke.

"I dunno," he said. "Somehow I wisht you was strong and—and happy."

The girl looked at him with wide shining eyes.

"Say," she said, "you're awful good. They ain't nobody ever said nothin' like that to me before. My paw was good to me but he never said that."

The waterman arose to his feet and stood kicking pebbles into the water.

"I reckon I better be gettin' along," he said.

The boat had drifted below them and was pulling on the rope.

"Could I go on your boat?" asked the girl.

"You bet you could," came the answer quickly, and the man hastened to bring the boat close to the shore. With awkward gentleness he assisted her into the boat.

The girl went from place to place on the little boat, exclaiming delightedly.

"Ain't it nice?" she said, "and it's just like a cute little house." And then, suddenly she became quiet and they climbed up to the roof in silence.

The boatman drank in her praise of his little home. He knew that it was rough and shabby, but it had the redeeming feature of being clean. However, he could not understand the girl's enthusiasm.

"'Taint much," he said, half embarrassed, and when she became silent he stood watching her and wondering. Finally he said, very timidly, "What you thinkin' about?"

The girl sighed. "I was jest wishin' I could live on a canal boat." There was no designing in her voice and she turned toward the man with childlike frankness.

A strange feeling took possession of him. His heart beat so hard he could scarcely speak. He had never felt so before.

"Would you—would you like to live on this un?" asked the man tremblingly.

"I think this un's grand," she answered.

"Would you—could you—do you think you'd wanta live with me?" stammered the poor fellow.

"You mean—" said the girl, her eyes wide with astonishment, "you mean—you want me to get married to you?"

Yes, that was what he meant, and the girl, untaught as she was and inexperienced, knew that he spoke with his whole soul.

"I ain't strong. I couldn't do no hard work," she said.

"You wouldn't have to do none at all if you didn't want to. Say, don't you like me? I—I jest feel like I can't leave you behind me." He paused for breath and to recover his surprise at himself for having spoken so much at one time.

And then this sudden desire of his. He did not understand it. All he knew was that something unknown before had come to life in him. He felt that this girl belonged to him and that he had the right to take care of her.

The girl stood gazing across the narrow strip of water, apparently watching the swallows as they circled and dipped close to the water. But her thoughts were very busy.

"Yes, I like you a lot," she finally said, "and I'm sure you like me and would be good to me. Do you think we could get away so's they won't know?" she asked.

"The folks go to bed early?"

The girl nodded.

All the boatman's latent powers of control came to the front and he set about arranging matters.

It was finally decided that she should slip away after her "folks" had gone to bed. Then they would go to the village a mile away and seek the only minister the place afforded. After that the canal boat was their home—together.

Their plans were not hard to carry out for everybody in the town and country round were fast asleep by nine o'clock. Even the necessary minister whom they roused from his slumbers.

By ten o'clock they reached their home. The moon shone softly over the little boat and lent a mystic beauty to the piles of miscellaneous articles on the flat roof.

"Ain't the moon lovely?" said the girl. "Let's walk across the field to the woods yonder. I've often wanted to go there when the moon was bright but I ain't never had nobody to go with me.

So they walked hand in hand across the broad, silvery field to the border of the woods that stood like a black wall before them.

"Oh," cried the girl suddenly and leaned heavily against him.

"What is it?" asked the man in alarm.

"My heart, that's all. Don't be scared, it 'ill pass all right in a minute."

But it did not pass, and in a few moments the young man felt his little wife grow limp in his arms. He raised her quickly and ran to the boat. But it was too late—when he laid her on the rude bed he knew that his life was as lonely as before—only a memory to keep him company.

She had showed him where she lived and he went to tell her "folks."

At first, of course, they would not believe him, but he told them of a note she had left for them to find in the morning, and they had to believe.

When they came and took away the body which had become so dear to him he did not go with them.

At the first ray of daylight he loosened the rope that held the boat, and bending his body to the work, he trudged on along the path he had trod for so many years.

MOTION PICTURE MUSINGS

In halls that well abound with sound,
In every land and strand are found,
All observant faces viewing well
The tale that motion pictures tell.

There is a sudden fading of light,
A sputter from the arc so bright,
A buzz of films in motion fast,
And light upon canvas is cast.

In darkness light and shadow breath
Mix, struggle well with each, and weave
All form and scene, to show in fact,
The voiceless soul's emotion and act.

The speech of feeling without sound,
By action truly here is found;
With majestic silence and impress,
Then all so grandly on us rests.

How well the actor plays his part
About the hope and scene at heart,
That seems so real, to vision shown
While it but on canvas is known.

We see the spur for distant goal,
For love, for success and rare gold;
Love, play and tragic phase amaze
In emotions display that we praise.

With eager eyes our thought is drawn
By films, that make us muse and dawn;
We dream and roam near castles shown,
In fancy, while views pass unknown.

The comedy makes us laugh in mirth,
The drama brings the sigh to birth,
But when the film to us seems real,
It ends and darkness comes with zeal.

The light is gone and all but fades,
No mirth, no sigh or act now jades,
All hope and scene to passing blends;
So our life's film of motion ends.

THE BRAID

By VIRGINIA WEST

Adapted from Comet Synopsis

When the doctor bowed his head in answer to the unspoken question on John Jackson's face, as he knelt by the bedside of his young wife, it seemed to the husband that the whole world had ceased to be. Nothing could be any longer, for Sarah was gone, and in Sarah lay the whole world. He sank, almost unconscious, to the floor and made no sound.

"Come, man, you must not give way like this," said the doctor in a gentle voice that sounded far away, and in which John took no interest whatever.

He did not answer.

"Help me a little, Nurse, and we'll take him to his room. He's fainted, but he'll come around soon."

The man allowed them almost to carry him into an adjoining room. He did not resist; he did not help himself; it was not worth while. Sarah was gone, and of course he would go too, in a short while. He vaguely wondered why they took the trouble to move him.

"He's better," said the doctor when he saw his eyes were open. "Just watch him a little. He'll be all right."

For a long time he lay counting the figures on the ceiling. What trivial things we do in the greatest crises of our lives! Nature seems deliberately to dull our senses for a while, until our nerves have had time to recover a little from the first shock.

Soon the sleep of utter exhaustion fell upon John, for he was weary from much watching and great anxiety.

How many times the nurse went softly out of the room he did not know. Nor did he care. He slept, and all was forgotten.

How long he slept the man did not know, but when, in the stillness of the night, he awoke all the house was dark and silent. Then his brain began to act, and with a rush everything came back to him. Sarah, his young wife, was dead, and he was alone in the world. His mind worked normally now and he knew that the world would not go to pieces but would go right on, and that he must go on with it somehow.

Then he thought over their life together. How perfect it had been! They had been doubly dear to each other through the fact that both were orphans, without brother or sister.

He arose from the bed. His Sarah lay in the next room and he would go to her. After lighting a candle he stole softly with it into the silent chamber. There she lay, cold and beautiful. Her dark hair, wound around her head in two great braids, glistened under the candlelight.

He stood for a moment gazing down upon the quiet face. "I am sure she would wish it," he whispered. He quickly crossed the room to a little work table and returned to the bed with a pair of scissors. Gently, reverently, he uncoiled the heavy braids, then stood for a moment holding them across his hand. "It seems almost a sin," he thought, "but I am sure you wish it, dear." Then closing his eyes he quickly cut through one heavy braid. Laying it aside, he deftly replaced the other one over the short ends. "I have a part of you now," he said, "to keep always." Very quietly he stole back into his own room.

When the funeral was over and the friends and relatives who had come to take charge of things had departed, John Jackson was like a caged animal. He did not know what to do nor where to go to get away from himself. His restlessness was terrible to see. He would not have anyone in the house with him. He said he could not stand anyone about. If he could not hear the voice and the footsteps of the one he loved, he did not wish to hear any about his house.

Everything reminded him of Sarah. Every sight and sound inside the house and out, and he was tortured almost beyond endurance.

Frequently he went to the public park near by and sat idly watching the people as they passed. Every woman he compared with his dead wife. It seemed impossible to keep himself from doing so.

One evening, about seven o'clock, he sat on his accustomed bench. He heard a laugh and turned his head. A young woman stood with her back toward him, talking gaily to a man. She was dressed in the extreme of fashion. How different from his Sarah, he thought, who dressed always with such tasteful simplicity.

The man held up his hand to the chauffeur of a taxicab near by and he and the woman turned to go to it. John Jackson's heart stood still for a moment, and then started beating so rapidly that it almost choked him. The woman was almost the exact image of Sarah, the difference being that her beauty was of a more vivid type.

The man handed his companion into the taxicab and bid her good-bye. As he turned away John sprang into another cab and gave orders to follow the one which had just sped up the street. He was in an agony of suspense lest he lose her.

In ten minutes his cab stopped and he saw the woman disappearing through the stage entrance of a theater.

It was but the work of a moment to pay his fare and purchase from the box office a ticket for the night's performance.

Seated near the front of the house, he waited in feverish impatience. Sarah, his Sarah, seemed to be behind that curtain, and he must wait there even to catch a glimpse of her.

At last the curtain arose. The play was one of the "Old Homestead" type, and the woman he was watching so intently took the part of a country girl. Her extreme of fashion was gone, and she seemed more and more like the dead wife.

When the curtain fell on the last act John Jackson had made up his mind to one thing: He must become acquainted with the actress. He knew of but one way. So, taking a card from his pocket, he wrote on it and then made his way to the stage door.

The doorkeeper took his card without a word, little guessing the cause of the tremble of John's hand or the huskiness of his voice.

When the card was brought to her dressing room she read it and laughed. Turning to a companion, she said:

"Say, girlie, this is something new. What do you 'spose he's up to? Listen: 'Miss Langford: If you have one spark of human kindness in your heart, you will see me. You must see me.' What do you say to that, Mamie?" she asked of her room-mate.

"He's struck sure," answered the girl. "Are you goin'?"

"I guess yes," said Miss Langford. "It sounds interesting. I'm not much on missing anything, eh, Mamie?"

"Well, there's one piece of advice I'd give," said Mamie with a wise air, "and that is to play your part like the nice little girl you were this evening. That's probably what struck him, and that's probably your best card. See?"

"You're a wise old owl, girlie, and I'll take your advice. Well, so long," she called as she hurried out, putting on her gloves.

"This is your card, I believe?" she said when she had found John standing near the stage door.

"Yes," he said in a low voice. "I first wish to beg your pardon for my unconventional act. I had no other way of meeting you."

"I quite understand," answered Miss Langford, "and I forgive you." She looked into his eyes and gave him her hand.

"You are so kind that you almost give me courage to ask a very great favor of you."

She smiled. "Ask it," she said.

John hesitated, embarrassed. Then, with the impetuosity of a boy, he hastily said: "I want you to come to my house and have supper with me. You attract me in a way—in a way—well, I cannot explain it to you."

She lowered her eyes—discreetly.

"I have offended you," he cried.

Slowly she raised her eyes to his. "No," she said; "I trust you and I will go with you."

"Oh, thank you, thank you," he cried feelingly. What if she should be like his Sarah and would be to him what she had been?

When the supper had been brought in from a nearby restaurant and disposed of, John said:

"Miss Langford, there is something I want you to know. I am a widower. And there is something I want you to do for me," he continued. "There is a dress which belonged to my wife that I should like to see you in. Would you mind trying it on?"

He felt that he must see her in his wife's dress. She looked so like her and filled him with such desire for her, and yet, in her own clothes, there was just that something in the actress which troubled him; that made her seem like his wife and yet not like her. He must see her in Sarah's dress.

Miss Langford had had a good supper and felt agreeable. Anyway, it didn't matter much to her—she was always ready for an adventure. If she did as she was requested, perhaps there might be more suppers in the future.

"Yes, I'll put on the dress," she said. "Just show me to my dressing room."

John led the way to his own dressing room. Somehow he could not bring himself to take this woman into the rooms of his wife.

"I'll bring you the dress here," he said, and went to get it.

He selected a dress of soft blue silk, one that Sarah had often worn, for he felt that he must see if this woman was really like her.

When he was away from her he seemed to have some grave misgivings, but the moment he came into her presence the likeness was so striking that it seemed almost that his wife had come back.

"Put this on, please," he said to Miss Langford, "and will you put your hair around your head in two braids?" and his voice trembled a little.

Miss Langford had not forgotten her part, even though it did seem to her that she was dealing with a man she didn't quite understand.

"You have been so kind to me, I am very glad to do anything to please you," she said, and he thought he saw tears in her eyes.

While she dressed he walked around his own room. He stopped before a little table upon which stood a single object—a jewel casket. It was a very beautiful thing which had belonged to his wife. It fastened with a secret spring lock, which would open only when touched in a certain way. The servants had strict orders never to touch the casket.

John Jackson stood now holding this casket in his hand. But he did not open it.

At a sound behind him he set down the box and turned. He gave a cry and then stood still gazing, gazing as though he would devour the woman before him with his eyes. She took a step toward hi mand said, "Well, how do you like me?" Wild with mingled feelings of joy and pain, he clasped her in his arms. "My wife," he cried: "you are, you will be."

The girl freed herself from his embrace, and, not in any way realizing the seriousness of the situation, went dancing merrily around the room. The man stood fascinated by her every movement. In passing the little table she chanced to notice the casket. She stopped and picked it up. She stood with her back to John, and he could not see that she was holding his treasure in her hands.

By some trick of fate she accidentally touched the spring and the lid flew up. There, revealed to her cold, unfeeling eyes lay the sacred braid. Before John knew what she was doing, she had carelessly pinned it around her head and gone dancing around the room again.

"Stop!" cried the man, "stop!" and when she only laughed at him, he seized her by the throat and tore the braid from her head.

The woman struggled, but his hold upon her was strong. The man was choking her. She had about resigned herself to her fate when suddenly he relaxed his hold and stood as if entirely oblivious of her existence.

John had suddenly heard his wife's voice speaking to him. It seemed to come from a portrait hanging above the little table.

Vaguely he heard the actress moving rapidly in the dressing room behind him, then speed down the steps and out through the front door. Still he stood listening for that beloved voice to speak again. And it seemed to him that it did.

"John, it is not only the body. Will not the memory serve to comfort? My spirit is near."

John fell upon his knees and bowed his head, his face pressed against the braid in his hand.

"Sarah, my wife, forgive me! I know now that you are near. Forgive this desecration," he cried in agony.

Then a great calm came over him, such as he had not felt since Sarah's passing. He raised his head, and there before him seemed to stand his wife, bright and beautiful. "I do forgive, freely—my husband," she said. And at last John Jackson was at peace.

OUR WESTERN CORRESPONDENT

Hot Springs, Ark., Feb. 28.—If there is any one in "the valley of vapors" who does not understand or comprehend the work that "Uncle Sam" is doing on the Isthmus of Panama, it will not be because motion photography hasn't been constituted a very important factor in the work of enlightening the people of all countries on this greatest of all canal projects.

This brings one face to face with a review of the Panama Canal pictures, which were the "headline" feature of this amusement here the past week. There have been quite a number of reels exhibited from time to time bearing on this work, and patrons of the various houses have seen the dirt fly on numerous occasions on the big ditch. It appears that the Government finally became cognizant of the fact that motion pictures of this work would not be confined exclusively to the broad domains of "the good old U. S. A.," but will also be sent to other countries, the governments of which are greatly interested in this gigantic engineering feat, which would, as one can readily see, make it possible for them to obtain very valuable information, which would come in mighty handy in case it ever became necessary to "unchain the dogs of war" and exchange those little pleasantries that add so much to the gaiety of nations and make imperative the Hague Peace Tribunal, in the shape of bombs, solid shot and shell.

All things have a beginning, including even the beginning of the end. The beginning of the end of motion pictures of the Panama Canal took place several months ago, and official Washington came to the conclusion that it would be much better to deny the public the right to gratify a natural desire to be informed through this medium of every bit of progress and thereby retain such secrets, than by permitting motion pictures to be made, which, in the end, would be studied by other governments. That is why "the lid" was put on the man who turned the crank and no more pictures will be permitted to be taken of that work.

The Panama Canal pictures came to the Photo Play Theatre this week. There were two reels of one thousand feet each. One of the reels, I was informed had been shown in Arkadelphia. The operator in the house there, evidently being a student of construction in general and canals in particular, and being desirous no doubt to be as consistent as possible with the cut up condition of that country, exemplified it fully in his treatment of the reel in question, so that when it was received in this city it was found necessary to submit it to a board of the city's most eminent physicians, who doctored it and made it possible for it to be exhibited here.

I want to go on record as saying that the pictures were the finest of an industrial nature that I have ever seen. To begin with, save for the defects in the reel aforementioned, they were bright and clear, and they showed every feature of the work. The name of the gentlemen who showed them isn't necessary for exploitation purposes, but as an additional fact of interest he had decorated the lobby of the Photo Play Theatre with some of the finest skins of animals and snakes that the people of this city have ever seen. The pictures drew a great crowd during the two days' run that they had here, and the Photo Play put another one across a few days later when it showed for the first time in this city the moving pictures of the last National Convention of the Royal Order of the Moose. The local lodge attended in a body. The feature of these pictures was the fact that one part showed the midnight parade of that order. They were very successful, were these reels, and attracted a great deal of attention.

Industrial pictures had the call, in fact, during the entire week, for the Moose feature had no sooner been run off than along came the Princess with the pictures of Gary, Ind., and these were "pippins." There is a company in Gary who think so much of their town what it has accomplished and what it will do in the future, that they are sending a man all over the United States to exhibit the pictures and get capital interested in the development of that city. The prospects for Gary are very bright, according to the pictures, and, of course, you have heard the old statement that "the camera does not lie," but when one considers that Gary is but six years old and that in that time the town has grown to some forty thousand souls, with about all the big steel industries in the country represented there, it makes one think that possibly, in after years, the development of Gary can be attributed to the motion pictures that advertised the city so thoroughly. Wesley Ansley lectured on the Gary reels at the Princess and his elucidation was much enjoyed.

In one of the local papers the past week there appeared on the first page a short story, which told how a clever bulldog had recovered a lady's pocketbook. It recited the fact that several hundred persons had watched the dog pick up the purse and carry it to the woman, and applauded the performance greatly. In this manner the article wound up, by stating that the dog was still in the city and could be seen in the moving picture at the new Central Theatre, that the dog's name was "Dooley"—and, of course, it was a cleverly written press notice, and it brought the results desired.

Aside from the industrial pictures there really wasn't anything startling in the moving picture field here the past week. All of the houses are featuring a very good line of pictures, but the town is thinking at present of the big horse show that is coming off here March 5th to 9th; of the visit, too, of Andrew Carnegie, and of the great throng that is crowding Central avenue, overflowing the Arlington and filling the Eastman and the Park Hotels. The houses are all doing a good business and if the moving picture places could have this kind of patronage all the year around that they do when the season is on, they would be as happy as those who own beach front property in Atlantic City, and that's about the greatest joy that I know of, for I've passed four seasons there.

THE MAN IN THE BATHS.

HOW THEY TAMED MARY—IN FLORIDA

The newest negative from their Florida aggregation to be received by Thanhouser Company goes under the title of "The Taming of Mary," and is heralded as a pretty unusual comedy. Mary was mighty jealous of her husband. Her jealousy, let it be said, was thoroughly without cause. One day, though, she got a letter signed "A Friend," enclosing a photo that showed her husband looking very endearingly at a very pretty woman. Furthermore, "A Friend" wrote that hubby and the she-devil had it all fixed for a meeting next day.

Mary got her anger goin'. She fairly "biled" with virtuous wrath. She got to the meeting place at the meeting hour, finely fitted out with a horsewhip. As her guilty helpmate loped in with the erring female, Mary put her whip in posion. But she didn't bring it whack down!—cause the female wasn't what Mary thought she was, and Mary was the goat in the little game that cured her of that jealous feelin'. The story releases Friday, March 22.

BETTER THAN GOLD
Imp Drama of March 21

"Better than Gold" is a story laid in the rough mining district of Southern California, when gold was the lure.

A young couple there, the man of which drinks and gambles and is generally a bad lot. His wife is the saving partner—saving, that is, in respect of personal heroism. She robs the man in whose house they are living and leaves something which is "better than gold" in payment. This something is her infant child.

Parson Jim, the miner man, accepts the charge and his fellow associates in the camp help him to take care of the little one.

In the passage of years, the father goes to the bad, and the mother works to pay the little one's schooling. But she is not very successful in this, as ill health overtakes her. Meanwhile, the child is sent by Parson Jim to a convent, where she is kept for many years. But age limit tells. She has to be sent home; so home she is sent to Parson Jim.

Just before she arrives, however, remorse has seized her stricken mother. She returns to Parson Jim to tell him why she had robbed him and why she had left her child in payment for the money she had taken. She is physically a wreck, and dies in Parson Jim's house.

When the girl, who has now passed into brilliant young womanhood, arrives "home," it is to learn of her origin and of the death of her mother.

The story concludes with a visit to the grave of the dead woman, and the marriage of the former waif to the man who had befriended her for so many years.

Margarita Fischer skilfully doubles the parts of mother and daughter, and Harry Pollard is Parson Jim.

The picturesque settings of California life a few decades ago are artistically rendered in this picture.

Toledo, Ia.—The erection of the new opera house here will commence as soon as possible.

FIDELITY

Forthcoming American Release

Sometimes there comes in the lives of all of us the supreme moment, when we are called upon to choose definitely the future of our lives. It sometimes happens that influence is brought to bear upon us to guide our choice, and it is usually found on the side we are least inclined to follow. When Sadie Powers found that she loved Jack King her father and mother tried very hard to have her reconsider her choice and look with favor upon Ed. Ellis. But Jack was an ardent wooer and the pretty little surprises he arranged for Sadie made her think of him constantly. One morning when she came to the well, Jack had been there before her and had filled "The Old Oaken Bucket" full of flowers for her. When her parents learned that she was not to be swayed from her decision to marry Jack her father cast her off, for Jack was poor and Ed. Ellis was wealthy. Leaving her home with the man of her choice, they were married and began life together in a poor but happy home.

Two years of happiness followed. Jack was considerate and kind, a child was born to them, and Sadie's life was complete. And then—the shadow fell over the bright outlook of their future, blotting out all happiness.

Jack was accosted on the street by a quarrelsome drunk, who made insulting remarks about his wife. It was more than human nature could stand and with one well-directed blow Jack felled him to the ground; his head struck the curbing, and when bystanders raised the fallen man it was found that life was extinct. Jack was immediately arrested, and, without funds to employ legal defense, he was railroaded to the penitentiary by his old rival Ed. Ellis, as foreman of the jury. Alone, Sadie and her child returned to her father's home and after the first sting of her grief was over she was constantly urged to secure a divorce and marry Ellis. And at last, for the sake of her child, she gives a reluctant consent.

But although Jack was sentenced for five years, good men who knew the true circumstances of the accidental killing brought influence to bear and after a year in the penitentiary Jack is released and pardoned. He returns to find his wife and, unseen, witnesses her reluctant consent to marry Ellis.

On the eve of her marriage with Ellis Jack places his gift of flowers in "The Old Oaken Bucket" and then hurries to the little home that once held so much of happiness, to be alone with his grief.

Sadie finds that, although promised to Ellis, she cannot bring herself to go through with the marriage and decides to return to the little home and away from her parents' influence. Taking her child, she steals away in the night and starts for home. She stops at the well and finds Jack's gift of flowers. Tender memories return to her, but she does not realize that he is free.

She enters the little home where Jack has flung himself down on the bed, but does not see him in the semi-gloom. But they feel each others' presence and Jack raises up to look into the loving, faithful eyes of his wife.

Once again they take up the thread of life together after their interrupted happiness.

NON-INFLAMMABLE FILM AT LAST!

It has been left for Germany, the home of modern science, to fill a long-felt requirement in the moving picture business.

The moving picture has suffered a great deal of criticism on account of the inflammable quality of the film. A great deal of anxiety has been felt by those interested in the public welfare because of the fire dangers said to be attendant on the moving picture.

A large and important manufacturing firm of Berlin, the Actien Gesellschaft für Anilin Fabrication, manufacturers of color, chemical and film produce, and all kinds of photographic supplies, perfected one year ago, after several years of experimenting, a satisfactory method of making non-inflammable film.

This film was exploited by leading German moving picture manufacturers some four or five months ago and found to be adequate to their needs, durable, and in every way equal to the ordinary film.

It is only now, however, that this much needed product has been actually placed on the market. The German is a shrewd business man, a careful worker and developer, and not until he is actually certain that his product is in shape to bear out his testimony will he risk his good name as a man of infallible business intuition. He works on the strength of the motto which reads something like this: "Be sure you're right, and then go ahead."

This fireproof product is being handled for the United States by the Raw Film Supply Company, 15 East Twenty-sixth street, New York City, and the up-to-date manufacturer will no doubt follow the lead of science and accentuate the value of his goods by taking advantage of this opportunity to assist in the protection of the general public.

GAUMONT RELEASE

The Gaumont 1,960-feet feature for release Saturday, March 9th, is one of special interest, dealing with unscrupulous methods put in use by the heads of the Rubber Trust to obtain certain information regarding a secret process for the manufacture of artificial rubber. The story is worked out in a most interesting manner, and the opportunities which circumstance throws in the way of the wily detective, enabling him to act for both parties and thus draw water to the well of the trust adds a very exciting element to the story.

One feels glad, however, after the capture of the young man who is bringing the truths of the secret process to Wilson, who has refused to join the trust, when the formula which has been written for the mighty trust fades from the paper, all traces of ink being obliterated, regardless of the fact that $10,000 has been paid by them for same.

The story is exceedingly tense, and the successful landing of the secret with its rightful owner leaves one with a satisfied feeling of all being well.

SHAMUS O'BRIEN

Imp Drama Release of March 14th

Several private exhibitions of the Imp Films Company's great drama, "Shamus O'Brien," have been given in the company's projection room at 101st street, to representative film men from all over the United States, together with others from across the Atlantic, including Mr. J. F. Brockliss, of London, and Mr. H. A. Brown, president of the Walturdaw Company of London, two of the largest and most influential men in the British film business.

Without exception the film has received unstinted praise as the finest piece of work the Imp Films Company has produced. Its success is a foregone conclusion.

The picture was conceived and made in five days, which having regard to the wonderful amount of work it contains, is really a remarkable piece of quick film making. The details are accurate to a nicety and the picture may be regarded as a triumph of motographic art.

A NIGHT'S ADVENTURE

(Champion)

The scene herewith depicts the three frightened girlies who are aroused from their sleep by invading burglars. They are alone in the house, as the parents have gone to spend the night elsewhere and thus this situation is one of affrighted nerves to them. One of them manages to pull herself together and phone for help, and when three male friends arrive they beat a hasty retreat at the sight of three chalkened faces looking down upon them from an upper window. They enlist the aid of a 'copper' and all four burst into the house with fear and trepidation to find three scared-to-death bundles of feminity oscillating on the verge of nervous collapse.

Released Monday, March 25th, 1912.

A number of the press were treated to an exhibition of a very splendid Nestor film during the past week. This film is entitled, "The Revelation." Taken as it was, among the beautiful groves of California, many are the splendid situations for fine photographic and dramatic effects afforded it.

The story is a fine one in every respect, carrying with it a good moral for the selfish, money corroded individuals who swarm the stock and money exchanges of the great cities.

A unique and unusual point in the picture is the incorporating of Salvation Army scenes. Some of the most beautiful moonlight scenes among the palms and terraces of California abound in this film.

THE SUNDAY SHOW FROM THE POOR MAN'S STANDPOINT

SITTING in the luxury of their homes before their warm, cheery fireplaces, the relentless pastor and the "idle rich" alike take issue at the holding of the Sunday picture show.

The man who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow, the man who spends the larger portion of his waking hours in the heat and grime of the foundry, the man whose ears are filled for six days in the week with the monotonous hum of revolving wheels, the whirling of belts, or the pounding of different automatic devices, this is the man who has the right to say whether or not on Sunday, his one day in the week for rest and relaxation and the absorption of something more than coal cinders, all places of recreation and amusement shall be closed. It is for him to say whether or not the shackles of subservience and poverty which clank about his ankles shall be supplemented by the elimination of the only form of recreation which his purse will allow.

The closing of the Sunday picture show is a criminal act. It is a crime against humanity. The moving picture has come to us as an educator. It has come to us as an aid in the educating and enlightening of the poor. Many a poor man whose chances for education have been limited but who is striving, by dint of hard work in this land of freedom and advanced thought, to give to his children that which has been denied to him in his earlier days, finds in the moving picture his only means of enlightenment, not speaking of the recreative side of the question.

The following letter copied from the Springfield, Mass., Evening Union, and written by one of that vast majority of human beings whose natural talents and opportunities are swallowed up in that large sad grind for bread, one of those who has time to mark God's good sunshine but once a week:

"Dear Sir: Just a few moments of your valuable time, please. I noticed in this evening's paper that you received more "kicks than comfort" for allowing the theatres to go open on Sundays. Of course one glance at this letter will show that it is not from a highly educated person. No; it is from a common laborer, blessed with poverty, but happy in many ways. First, that I have a job; second, that I have only to work from 6 a.m. to 10 p.m. in order to earn $10.50 a week, which just keeps my family lukewarm these cold days, and by living on the cheapest grade, I can afford to let my children continue their education; and third, to think that the Mayor of "Spotless Town" has left a small chance open for the many unfortunates who are compelled by honesty and their consciences to lead a straight life, and who gladly sacrifice the light of day, and the Godly gift of fresh air, and must feel content with only dreams of a home of our own, to enjoy a ten-cent picture show on Sunday. Many, many thanks for your thoughtfulness.

"I consider this Sunday show a luxury, and look for it from week to week as anxiously as many ministers do for a big collection. And I trust you will continue to favor the majority of working people who do not have a chance to visit the theatre during the week. If you receive too many kicks from people of leisure, why not let the people vote and the majority say? The majority is working people, and they are strong for you. Why not continue their friend?

"Yours truly,

"G. V. B."

In a postscript to the above the following quotations appear: "Anybody who is enjoying good health and will complain about the pleasures of others has very little to do," and "Some people are like mosquitoes. They are never at rest unless they think they are getting a living by holding some people down. I am the other kind of a man. When everybody is happy, I am the same. Please excuse mistakes, for I started to work when I was 11 years old and I have been at it for 25 years, and my chance has not come to go to school yet."

It seems to me there is a strain of bitterness and pathos in the above, and there is most certainly a strong rebuke for the would-be "Sunday joy breakers." Mayor Lathrop of Springfield, to whom the above letter was addressed, has shown a kinship in sentiment by allowing it to be published.

Let us not deny those less fortunate than we the little mite of comfort which they derive from the innocent Sunday picture show, but, on the contrary, let us do all we can to promote its efficiency to accomplish a good purpose by striving to eliminate anything that may be unhealthful in the atmosphere of individual theatres.

BILL YOUR NEIGHBORHOOD

Boston, March 3, 1912.

Dear Sirs:

Passing through New Bedford, Mass., yesterday, I was more than surprised to see how the manager of the Comique Theatre, of that city, has billed "East Lynne," a Thanhouser picture-play. I surely saw over 50 lithographs, one-half and one sheets, and due credit should be given to that hustler, as all of them were in good spots and surely will get some business.

Thanking you, I remain,

Yours truly,

Daily Consular and Trade Reports of Moving Pictures Abroad

[By Consul John N. McCunn, Glasgow.]

Widespread Popularity

The moving picture business is increasing rapidly, as is shown by the fact that in 1907 there were only 4 picture shows in Glasgow, while now there are upward of 100. Every town of 4,000 or 5,000 inhabitants has its picture show.

Practically every known make of machine is used, and every known film maker is represented. There are no picture machines made in this district and films are manufactured only to a limited extent, such as those showing daily chronicles of local events, etc. There are a number of firms dealing in the exchange and hire of films.

GERMANY

[From Consul General Alexander M. Thackara, Berlin.]

It is estimated that there are about 1,500 moving picture shows in Germany, some 360 being in Berlin. The number is subject to marked fluctuation. A variation throughout the Empire of as much as 50 a week is not unusual. The general trend, however, is toward an increase.

This is true not only of the number of shows in operation, but also of the seating capacity. It is estimated that the average seating capacity of the cinematograph theaters in Berlin is at present 360, having risen from 280 within a short time. There are few large theaters devoted exclusively to moving pictures. One new moving picture theater now under construction will have a seating capacity of 1,200.

Film Supplies

The managers of moving picture shows lease the films from middlemen, here called "buyers." There are 60 or more of these buyers throughout the Empire—14 in Berlin; 7 in Leipzig; 3 each in Munich, Cologne and Hamburg; 2 each in Frankfurt, Dresden, and Stuttgart, and 1 or 2 each in Chemnitz, Nuremberg, Dusseldorf, Hanover, Crefeld, Strassburg, Brunswick, Carlsruhe, Bochum, and other less important cities.

The buyers purchase the films outright from the manufacturers or from their agents. Films are sold by the meter (3.28 feet), the standard price for this unit being one mark (23.8 cents). This is equivalent in American standards to 7¼ cents a foot. As the cost of producing the films averages 5¾ cents a foot, the usual profit is 1½ cents, which is low as compared with other countries, the average manufacturer's selling price in Great Britain being reported as 8 cents and in the United States as 10 to 12 cents. One firm dealing in what are known as special releases, that is, extra long films, is able to command 1.25 marks per meter. Their films are seldom less than 850 feet in length, and once each week the company turns out a film of 3,000 feet. There are two German film manufacturers which make a specialty of extra long films, producing none under 3,000 feet in length. These longer films as a rule have love stories for their subjects.

Severe Competition Among Dealers

Competition among the middlemen is as severe as that among the manufacturers. As a result, showhouse managers do not come to Berlin and other centers to procure their films, but are waited upon by agents who tour the Provinces. Competition has now reached such a point that a movement has been started for the organization of a company, to be capitalized at 2,000,000 marks ($238,000), to exercise an effective control over the entire trade in cinematograph films, with Berlin as its center. The idea is encountering strong opposition, and its realization is uncertain.

One result of the competition, coupled with an almost uniform price for films, is that the middlemen are quick to take up films which embody any point of superiority, and the market is very responsive to merit. This is an advantage to foreign film manufacturers seeking to enter this market, which in a measure compensates them for the disadvantage arising from the keen competition among manufacturers now in the field.

Police Censorship—American Films Popular

In addition to the severity of competition, account must also be taken of the censorship which the police authorities exercise. The police direct special attention to the elimination of all pictures depicting scenes of disorder or acts of violence such as might incite a riot or accustom the people to breach of the peace. Special attention is also directed to the elimination of all pictures the action of which depicts disrespect for authority or holds up to ridicule or contumely officers of the law or other servants of the government. It will readily be seen that this excludes from the German market many American films, such as some of those which show stories of frontier life and attendant disorder or such as make a policeman, or other person in authority, the butt of a comedy skit. All films depicting pugilistic contests are absolutely barred. Objection is also made to pictures involving religion on the ground that they may incite sectarian feeling.

American films enjoy a wide reputation and popularity in Germany. In Berlin more than a dozen American film companies are represented, and all are reported to be doing a fair business. With one exception they are represented by Germans. Three other American firms have combined their representation in one agent.

A moving picture operator in Berlin is paid 30 to 40 marks ($7.14 to $9.52) a week. Operators in the smaller cities receive 20 to 30 marks ($4.76 to $7.14).

[From Consul General Frank D. Hill, Frankfort on the Main.]

Foreign Pictures in Demand

Moving picture shows are in operation in all cities of any importance in this district and in Germany. According to an estimate recently published in a local paper, there are 2,500 such shows in Germany, of which 300 are located in Berlin. There are some 15 moving picture shows at Frankfort on the Main. The more important establishments renew their programs twice a week.

Films are manufactured by a number of German houses, of which the most important are in Berlin. The average production of leading German concerns is estimated at 3,280 to 3,937 feet per week. There is, however, an excellent market for foreign films in Germany, three-fifths of those exhibited here, according to reliable estimates, being imported.

Dealers advise this office that German manufacturers have greatly improved their product during the last few months, paying much more attention to quality of material used, subjects, and talent employed. Some of the leading Berlin stars now act for films.

Method of Selling Films

The film business, particularly in foreign films, is conducted as follows: The manufacturer has a general agent in Berlin, one man often representing several firms. This agent travels through Germany, making the entire circuit every two weeks with his new pictures. There are about 45 customers to be seen in the different centers. In each city of any importance there are one or more houses which buy the films outright from manufacturers; the price paid for films being 1 mark (23.8 cents) per meter (3.28 feet). These firms then let the films to the moving picture shows, which keep them sometimes a few days, sometimes weeks, according to popularity and intervals at which programs are changed. The so-called "verleihanstalten"—firms which buy films from manufacturers and rent to shows—are often important concerns, well fitted up, with rooms for showing pictures, etc.

French films are very popular here, and English films also find a good market. The English subjects are good, but complaint is made that on account of the dampness of the English climate the films do not last. American films are also in demand, this office being advised that some 10 American manufacturers are represented at Berlin. The subjects most in demand are those dealing with Indian life, cowboys, wild West scenes, etc. Pictures must be of such a character as not to come into conflict with the censorship exercised by the police.

PEGGY GOES TO VAUDEVILLE

The little comedienne who played the title role in all the releases in Lubin's "Peggy" series has left moving picture work and entered vaudeville. She has enlisted with Lydia MacMillan in a variety sketch, and so we shall miss her face in the films. "Peggy" (or Peggy Glynn, to give her full name) made a reputation in Independent pictures before she joined the licensed Lubin organization. She was with Powers and Thanhouser, and made a hit in one of the latter pictures called, "The Train Despatcher," in which she pluckily climbed a telegraph pole that was swaying to and fro in the wind.

"Peggy" really got to the "top 'o the top," and saved the day for the director. When questioned about this dare-devil feat later, she simply said, "Oh, it was easy. My director told me to get to the top, and then I heard the camera purring. The wind was shaking the pole frightfully but I simply kept my eyes upward and kept moving until I had only air overhead."

THE CHILD OF THE TENEMENTS

(Solax)

CAST

Lydie Martin.....Blanche Cornwall
Tom Martin.....Mace Greenleaf
Their child.....Magda Foy
Mike, a neighbor.....Lee Beggs
Dr. Mann.....Darwin Karr
Kate .....Fannie Simpson
Mill hands, etc.

What mother wouldn't sacrifice almost everything she has and holds sacred and dear to her, for her offspring? Such is the law of nature. It is a higher law than the law of governments—for experience has shown that a mother may kill and rob for the sake of her children, and yet there isn't a jury on earth that would convict her for her crime.

In the Solax production of "The Child of the Tenements," the release of Friday, March 22d, we forgive Mrs. Martin for robbing her benefactor, so that she may take her child out among the trees and flowers and give it a chance for life and happiness. We sympathize with the suffering child of the tenements and manifest a profound regard for the courageous mother. Although it may sound hackneyed to say so, this production is a production which touches the heart-strings. This is the story.

Lydie Martin has trouble with her ailing child. Dr. Mann, the visiting settlement doctor and the friend of the West Side poor, does all he can to help Lydie and her sick child. Tom Martin, Lydie's husband, is out of a job and things look pretty black. The child has no chance in the atmosphere and filth and dirt. Lydie plans to take her child and her husband to the country, a place in California where a neighbor has relations—a place the neighbor speaks of very often. But there is no prospect of going—her husband is out of work and three hundred dollars are needed.

One day Dr. Mann while making his rounds of the tenement stops in to see the Martins—for he always makes their rooms his headquarters while in the district, because they are the cleanest. He leaves his coat and bag on a chair. Mrs. Martin is wretched. She sees visions of herself and family comfortably settled out in California—but she cannot go there Her child will not be able to grow up strong and healthy—it will be a weakling all its life Mrs. Martin moves about the room with unsteady and sinking spirits.

When her eyes light on the wealthy doctor's coat, a sudden impulse impels her to go through the doctor's pockets. She finds his wallet, from which she removes just enough that would take her and hers to California. Just as she takes the money, an evil-minded and jealous neighbor sees the act and immediately goes off to report to the police.

In the meanwhile, Lydie Martin makes hasty preparations for a departure to California, explaining to her husband that the doctor had loaned her the money. Just as she is about to go, the police break in and she is accused of theft. The doctor is brought in and he tells the police that he loaned the money to Mrs. Martin. Mrs. Martin thanks him with grateful eyes and the little family start for fresh air and happiness.

THE TANKVILLE CONSTABLE

The Tankville constable applied the literal letter of the local law to over-speeders. The limit was 10 miles. Of course, he had his hands busy. Unfortunately he tries to stop the local judge, and the local judge makes a detour, and comes to grief in his car, being thereby much injured.

Now, the Tankville constable dreams a dream. He dreams that he is arrested and sent to jail for the offense of which he is guilty, and in his dream he goes through a series of very harrowing, and from the spectators' point of view, amusing experiences. He is chased, and electricuted and maltreated in a variety of other ways. Finally the Tankville constable wakes up and he is so impressed with the absurdly impracticable speed law that he ostentatiously changes the 10 on the board to 100, thereby assuring himself from further trouble of stopping local magnates in their rides.

This comedy gives rise to a bewildering series of diverting situations. It is well acted by the members of the Imp Californian Company.

Unbaffled by his poor success, Reuter engages the services of a young fellow of charming appearance to woo and win the widow for him under the pose of his nephew. The supposed nephew makes rapid headway and soon wins the widow's heart, to such an extent that it is impossible to get her to transfer her affections to Herr Reuter. Chagrined and infuriated, the latter orders his employee to leave, only to find that things have advanced too far and that the widow refuses to let her sweetheart get away from her without marriage. Thus the widow, Reuter's supposed nephew and all the other guests of the hotel have the laugh on the old gentleman. On the same reel

The first guess is the left and then when found to be wrong, the right, only to learn that the beast has two good eyes—of course Jimmie walks off with his donkey while the sheriff goes off with the guilty fellow.

NICHOLAS NICKLEBY

Nicholas Nickleby was the son of a country gentleman who died leaving his family destitute. The son, his sister Kate and their mother, went to London, hoping that the father's brother, Ralph, would aid them to secure a livelihood. Ralph, a money lender and a miser, was indifferent to the claims of those of his own blood, but the beauty of Kate impressed him and he thought that she might be of assistance to him in his business life. To get the girl in his power he sent Nicholas to Yorkshire, as assistant to a schoolmaster, Squeers, promising to care for his mother and sister. With Nicholas out of the way, he planned to use the girl to lure rich men to his home and loan them money on excessive terms.

The girl, however, was too high-minded and pure to lend herself to any such scheme, although for some time she did not believe that her uncle was to blame. In the meantime, Nicholas found that the "school" was a den of infamy, the pupils neglected, starved and ill-treated, and Squeers a drunken, brutal, ignorant tyrant. For the sake of his mother and sister he stood it as long as he could, but finally the cruelty of Squeers to a poor drudge, Smike, aroused his just indignation. He thrashed Squeers soundly, and left the school forever. Returning home he finds his uncle, who is reviling the two helpless women and telling them that he will force them to obey his commands. Nicholas enters just in time, declares he will protect his mother and sister, and orders his ungrateful and heartless uncle from the house. In addition he promises Smike that he will have a home with them for the rest of his life.

PART TWO

Nicholas Nickleby, after his lively but unfortunate experiences at the school of Wackford Squeers, returns to London determined to make a home for his mother and sister. He fails to find work, and his uncle Ralph offers to see that the women are cared for, if Nicholas will go out into the world and shift for himself. Nicholas, with no prospects, consents and leaves London, accompanied by the faithful Smike.

At a roadside inn the wayfarers fall in with Vincent Crumeles, a theatrical manager, who offers them employment. They gladly accept, and in his new vocation Nicholas quickly achieves fame. He arouses the jealousy of other members of the company and one of the men plots to "take him down a peg," but the vigorous tactics of Nicholas bring the scheme to naught and adds new laurels to his credit.

In the meantime, Nicholas' sister Kate has been exposed to insult in the home of her uncle and he does not defend her. His clerk, Newman Noggs, who has kept a watch over her, warns Nicholas and he comes back to London, post-haste.

Immediately after his arrival, Nicholas, by chance, meets Sir Mulberry Hawk, who has annoyed his sister with his attentions, and Nicholas successfully defends her honor.

Nicholas secures employment with the firm of Cherryble Brothers, his employers being two kind hearted men, who, finding that he is honest, able and industrious, gladly aid him to success. At their establishment Nicholas meets Madeline Bray, with whom he falls in love. He is able to prevent her from being united to a worthless old miser who has her father in his power and in the end wins her love.

THE TAMING OF MARY
Thanhouser Release, March 22

They were an old married couple, yet she was jealous. It seemed to her that every woman they met had designs on her middle-aged husband, although the man thoroughly realized that his days of romance were passed, never to return. Personally, he wished that he did not have the reputation of being a gay Lothario, for the wife scolded and nagged and expressed herself in unpleasant terms from morning to night.

They went on a pleasure trip South, but he failed to enjoy himself; his wife would not let him. Then, with the aid of a friend, he decided to make one desperate effort to cure his wife of her foolishness, mentally deciding that if he failed that he would do something desperate.

The wife received a lette rone day signed "a friend," enclosing the photograph of ner husband and a beautiful woman, and from appearances they were very much in love with each other. "A Friend" explained that he would enable the wife to confront the brazen creature if she so desired, and told ber where to meet him. She was promptly on hand at the appointed hour armed with a horsewhip, willing and eager to get her name in the newspapers.

She met the woman, but did not lift a hand to her. No, it was not her husband's long-lost sister, but under the circumstances the wife could not wax angry. Furtbermore, it taught her a lesson and she stopped being jealous, for the best way to cure such a woman is to make her ridiculous, and tbat was exactly what happened in this case. On the same reel

THE GOLF CADDIE'S DOG

The man was a beautiful golf player, the woman was a beautiful girl, but so far as her playing was concerned, well, the less said about it the better. The man, however, loved her for the foozles she made, for love is blind, even on the golf links.

They were playing over the course in St. Augustine, and although the twosomes were one-sided Mr. Bogey had nothing on them when it came to the love match. Tbeir darkey caddy looked on and approved, for he greatly admired the young man and treated the girl with tolerance, because a good player seemed to be very fond of her.

Then came the quarrel. Tbe girl could not get out of a bunker and, in a rage because the man laughed, she decided to get out of her engagement. It was a sad blow for the man and equally sad for the caddy. He had been "carrying double," but now he had lost two patrons at one fell swoop.

The girl came to the links one day, hired the caddy and started around by herself. After a short time she met a young man, sent her clubs back to the house and flirted with her new admirer. The caddy did not approve. He objected to the second suitor, first, because he could not play golf, and second, because he was a dude. Lastly, he had a very poor opinion of the girl who would desert a hero to accept the attentions of a man who didn't play golf.

On the way back to the clubhouse the caddy thought deeply. He saw his hero "teeing off," and decided to start something. So he went home, got his "trifling" dog, and made him mad. Then he turned him loose on the links, gave tbe alarm and waited for developments.

The outcome was as he had expected. The "dude" deserted tbe girl and climbed a tree. The "hero," wbo was not in the plot, rescued the maiden in distress, restored himself to her good graces, and the caddy again found pleasure and profit in "carrying double."

How do you make a good natured dog mad? Give a darkey caddy some hot water and plenty of soap and he will tell you, if he feels so inclined. There is nothing magical about it, but it can be worked most effectively, and is proven in this case.

THE REVELATION
Nestor Release, March 11

Arthur Colville is a member of the Stock Exchange. Through luck, coupled with clever, constant work, he accumulates a fortune estimated at several million dollars.

The pursuit of riches strips him of that love which man should have for his fellowmen. The power of gold dominates him to such an extent as to make him cold even toward his own wife and only son. He has a positive aversion for the poor, and not only refuses aid to worthy people but brutally repulses their appeals. A Salvation Army lassie is none too gently shown the door. A starving man is actually thrown aside with violence and a woman in tatters, with an infant in her arms, is avoided as though she were pollution.

After spending the evening at the opera, Mr. Colville makes himself comfortable in a luxurious rocker, facing the fireplace, and then proceeds to enjoy a perfecto. Gradually he falls asleep and dreams: At his office everything goes wrong, and the vagaries of the stock market completely wipe away his fortune. By rapid stages he descends to the level of a beggar. In a dilapidated attic where he lives, his only child is ill unto death, and his wife almost mad with hunger and grief. The doctor calls and does his utmost to save the boy's life. The Salvation Army lass also comes, bringing with her a hasketful of foodstuff. This alleviates the wants of the suffering trio. He grovels before the doctor and the girl, offering them his heartfelt gratitude and his everlasting thanks. Then he suddenly awakes. For the moment he cannot realize that he has been dreaming, and the father instinct makes him rush into his child's bedroom. Frantically he takes up the boy and makes sure he is well. When fully awake, Colville firmly decides to change his mode of living and devotes his time and money to the welfare of mankind.

THE FIGHTING CHANCE

Nestor Release, March 13

Trego Bill and Pete, two outlaws, are partners. While Bill is dreaming of going to a new country to commence all over again and live on the square, Pete enters and asks Bill for money, as Pete has spent all of his money for drinks and in gambling. Pete is angry and takes out a reward placard, reading "$500 reward for information leading to the capture of Trego Bill—John Kelly, Sheriff."

Pete decides to pose as a stranger and betray his partner to gain the reward. He goes to the sheriff's house. The sheriff and his men, headed by Pete, start off for Bill's shack. Bill, in the meantime, has packed up, and leaving a note for Pete, starts away. On the trail he sees the sheriff and posse with Pete and becomes suspicious. He hides until they have passed, then rides back to see what they are after. Dismounting some distance from the shack. Bill creeps up and overhears enough of their conversation to convince him that Pete has betrayed him. He hurries to where the sheriff's horses are tied. Selecting Pete's, he drives him off, leaving Pete to catch his horse.

As he comes up to his horse, Bill appears and accuses Pete. A violent quarrel arises. Pete shoots Bill and runs. Bill stops to bind up his wound, then follows. Pete runs on and on until he comes to a shack. Seeing a ladder leading to the attic, and fearing Bill's appearance at any moment, he climbs up and crawls into the window. Presently he hears voices below, and looking through a hole in the trap door he sees a man and wife putting away a couple of bags of gold. They soon go out. Pete drops into the room and secures the gold just as the woman, who was only hidding her husband goodby in the path, returns.

She springs at Pete and they struggle; Pete finally knocks her down and picking up the gold to run out is met by Bill. The wife runs out calling after her husband, and overtaking him as the men struggle. The man returns just in time to prevent Pete from killing Bill with his upraised knife. As the husband covers Pete with his revolver, Bill hears the sheriff and his men approaching with the wife, whom they had met on the road. He runs out, leaving Pete to be placed under arrest.

THE UNKNOWN MODEL

Nestor Release, March 16

Mrs. Brown's birthday is approaching. Huhby, of course, wants to do the right thing and to do it well. What shall he give her? He finally decides on giving her a surprise, that is, surprise her with a new dress patterned after the latest Parisian style, a style she has much admired. A fashionable dressmaker is taken into his confidence, but before he can go ahead with his plan he must manage to get his wife's exact measurements, and furthermore advertise for a model that would fill the bill. Brown steals his wife's "measure" most successfully and then proceeds to get a model.

His office is stormed by a bevy of pretty girls, all eager to do the model stunt. Mrs. Brown happens to drop in, and in a spirit of fun poses as a model. The dressmaker promptly engages her, as the lady, more than any other, answers every requirement. Promising to report for duty on the morrow, Mrs. Brown departs, but not until the dressmaker, womanlike, has acquainted her with Mr. Brown's intended surprise to his better half.

In due time the dress is finished, and Mr. Brown is informed to call at the dressmaker's at 2 p.m. to see the lovely creation on the model. At the appointed hour Mrs. Brown, fully garbed in the new garment, awaits her husband's appearance. Business, however, detains him, and the Mrs. slips out unnoticed by the dressmaker, intending to surprise Mr. Borwn at his office. Brown manages to get through with his business deal and makes a Marathon dash to the dressmaker's. Here he finds that both model and dress have vanished. The police are quickly called into the case, and they soon catch Mrs. Brown with the goods on. At headquarters. Brown realizes that the surprise, though on his wife, is "on" him.

A TRAGIC EXPERIMENT

Reliance Release, March 27

Hager, an old chemist, has been for years experimenting upon a certain combination of chemicals that he expects to make his fortune with. His older daughter, Jane, disbelieves in any such consummation, but Gertrude, the younger daughter is enthusiastic that her father will succeed. Gertrude is brought home one afternoon by a rich young promoter, Findlay, after she had sprained her ankle. Jane takes an instant dislike to Findlay, but Gertrude quickly loses her heart to him. He learns of Hager's experiment and becomes greatly interested, much to Jane's dislike. Hager promises to allow Findlay to finance the experiment, and succeeding before he expected he has Jane phone to him to come to the laboratory at once. Findlay comes and the papers are drawn up. He takes a phial of the precious fluid with him and the other phial is placed on a safe. He is in such a hurry when he departs that Jane's further suspicions are aroused, as her father will not tell her what happened between them. Hastening to get to the city, Findlay breaks the phial and leaves his packing to rush back to the laboratory to get the other phial. Jane sees him rush through into the laboratory, and again becomes suspicious but is called out of the room for the moment. In the laboratory Findlay finds Hager asleep and gets the other phial without disturbing him, leaving a note to the effect that he is leaving town at once, etc. Hager awakes, reads the note and tears it in half, using one half to place beneath some chemicals. Going to the sink he slips and falls, pulling down the draperies, some statuary and knocking over the chair. Jane comes back into the parlor in time to see Findlay rush out. Later, when she goes to see her father, she finds him on the floor to all appearances dead. Gertrude is called and Jane tells her that she believes that Findlay killed her father. She phones the police and a doctor, then rushes off to catch Findlay before he can leave town. She finds him and accuses him, but as he does not understand she seizes his revolver and is about to shoot him when the phone rings, telling her the police are coming. They apprehend Findlay and take him back to the Hager home. In the meantime the doctor has been able to bring Hager back to consciousness and he secures the other half of the paper and explains how it all happened, and Findlay and Gertrude are offered the old chemist's blessings.

THE FUR SMUGGLER

Reliance Release, March 30

Ruth Maynard lives happily with her father up in the snowbound woods near the Canadian border. Her father and Steve Phillips are fur smugglers and have always managed to evade the watchful eyes of the customs officers. Walter Leggett, a young customs officer, vows to discover the smugglers and through his sweetheart, the school teacher in Maynard's vicinity, decides to get on the trail of Maynard. He plans a ruse wherehy he will be taken into Maynard's cabin supposedly very ill. The ruse works far better than he expected, for he manages to win the love of Ruth during his supposedly convalescent period. Steve resents Leggett's intrusion and suspects him. He gives Ruth his revolver for protection and she has no occasion to use it until Leggett leaves, making an appointment to meet her down by the river. Steve sees Leggett with the school teacher and later meets Ruth patiently waiting at the tryst. She won't believe Steve at first, then Leggett not coming she runs home where she discovers Leggett searching and finding the hidden furs. Securing the gun she waits for him. He discovers her purpose and wrenches the gun from her, then runs down the trail. The school teacher coming along, sees the whole affair; Loggert stumbles, and, in falling, shoots himself. When Steve is taxed with the killing through the fact that it was his gun that was used, he realizes that Ruth alone must be the responsible one and so shoulders the blame himself. Ruth and the teacher arrive in time to clear Steve and later she slips from her father's comforting arms to seek those of Steve and is forgiven.

THE MAN FROM THE WEST

Imp Release, March 18

When a Westerner comes East, he is at once "placed" in the minds of the alleged cold-hearted dwellers on the shores of the Atlantic. It is traditional and almost proverbial, but it is not true, that the inhabitants of the Eastern States are deficient in warmth of heart; they are opposed in mind and feeling to the people who live toward the Pacific Ocean side of the country.

When Cousin Steve, from the West, finds his way to the East, therefore, he verified the partial truth of this tradition. He stayed with his relatives and mistook their innocent attentions for designs upon his peace of mind. He did not understand the Eastern veneer of civilization. He got into trouble with the butler; he saw a cabman abusing a horse and unwisely interfered; he rescued a girl in distress, and generally did a lot of things the average Easterner regards as unnecessary. Steve floundered badly in fact. Still his heart was in the right place.

There was a family conspiracy to get him to marry his cousin, who loved another. Steve, too, had conceived other ideas. The cook of the family was a very comfortable and good-natured girl, with whom Steve, in his blunt, homely way, had struck up a flirtation and then a friendship.

MR. ALMOST BUTT IS NOT THE NAME OF A FILM!
IS NOT A GOAT!
HE BUTTS IN NEXT WEEK! WATCH!

The old proverb that the way to a man's heart is through his stomach was put into practice by the adroit young cook. She made excellent pies and Steve liked pies, and liked the maker so much that he decided to marry her.

Steve, in his good heartedness, makes a very handsome present to the man in love with his cousin, whom he regards somewhat critically as a clotheshorse and not a woman.

This story is of the domestic kind which strikes a widely acceptable note. It proves that after all, the heart is the predisposing factor in marriage, even amongst men of the primitive type of Cousin Steve, who are supposed to fall for mere externals.

King Baggot has the part of Cousin Steve; Vivian Prescott is the cook; William Shay and Violet Horner play the young couple who are united by Steve's generosity.

BETTER THAN GOLD
Imp Release, March 21

A good-natured miner, Jim Stafford, harbored in his house a young couple, who had not met with the best of luck. They had a child. Harry Green, the husband, drank somewhat and gambled and lost. Matters came to that point when both he and his wife were penniless. So, in Jim's absence, they steal his money and by way of payment they leave something "far better than gold," their baby.

Jim accepts the child. He reared the child until she was of an age to be educated. So when she was rising seven, she was put into a convent. Jim and his associates took leave of her, and the former is left lamenting the loss of his little foster child.

Meanwhile, things have gone from bad to worse with Harry Green and his wife. He has become a degenerate and she has to get their bread by washing. Years pass. The child finishes her term in school and is to go home, and home she goes.

But the instincts of a mother are strong upon Myrtle Green and she makes her way to Parson Jim's house and before the girl arrives confesses to Jim that it was she who left the little baby in his house so many years ago. The struggle is too much for the woman; she dies.

When the girl arrives home it is to learn of her mother's death. In company with Parson Jim she visits the grave of the dead woman.

The schoolgirl has become a woman, and it is obvious that when both learn the truth, lonely Parson Jim finds a future wife in the little waif that years before was intrusted to him as "better than gold."

CLASSICAL DANCES BY COUNTESS DE SWIRSKY
Imp Release, March 23

Pictures of dancing subjects are apparently rare. The dance, however, as a theme for motion picture rendering has great possibilities and this particular Imp release avails itself of them in an admirable degree.

The series is given by the Countess Thamara de Swirsky, who first of all offers a humorous dance and then one entitled "Spirit of Music." A series of plastic poses form part of the offering.

The dancer seeks to interpret musical effects by the poetry of motion. The dances, therefore, besides having mere aesthetic value are also scientifically esteemed because of the suggested possibilities of correlating movement to sound or even light. In other words, the dances as illustrated by Mlle. de Swirsky may be regarded as a composition which appeals as strongly to the eye as music may be understood to appeal to the ear.

These dances, therefore, should have considerable educational value. On the same reel

THE TANKVILLE CONSTABLE

Eben Green, the Tankville constable, was a deadly enemy of the overspeeder. The local limit was ten miles an hour and Eben, brave man, held all and sundry to the strict limit of the law. The result was that he was constantly getting himself in "Dutch" with his good friends.

Eben seeks repose from his labors by the wayside and falls asleep and he dreams a dream. He and his help endeavor to stop an automobile driven by a local judge, but the judge evades the obstacle placed across the road, and in evading it meets with an accident.

On recovery from this accident he has poor Eben arrested for attempted murder, and he is condemned to thirty years hard labor. His troubles as a convict are terrible to follow, but finally he escapes from his prison by scaling its walls, after the guards have unsuccessfully attempted to electrocute him.

The convict constable, of course, coalesces with the real constable in the picture, and when Eben awakes and comes to his senses he changes the Tankville sign from ten miles an hour to 100 miles an hour. By this means he relieves himself of further trouble by "overspeeders."

Jack Raymond, a young man in the employ of a real estate firm, learns to love the pretty stenographer in the office and his attentions were not unpleasing to the lady. But the manager also admired her and determined to show her attentions. Flattered, the thoughtless girl accepted his attentions and allowed him to escort her home.

They are observed by Jack and in a jealous rage he accosts her employer when he is returning, and demands that his attentions to his sweetheart cease. He then hurries to the home of the girl and demands that she choose between him and his employer.

She answers him in kind words and then leaves him abruptly and he finds that instead of helping matters he has widened the breach. When he reports for duty the next morning he is discharged for impertinence. And in the weeks that follow he finds work impossible to secure and is soon reduced to poverty.

In the meantime the employer has made more and more advances to the girl until one morning in the office, believing her acquiescent, he attempts to insult her. Freeing herself from his arms the outraged girl takes her hat and leaves his employ. She hurries home to her mother and tells her the whole story.

That he should be repulsed, rankles in the breast of the manager and he determines to humble the girl. Her mother's property is listed with the firm and he determines to defraud her out of it. He tells his new stenographer to call the young man employed to take Jack's old position and outlines his plans to him.

Now this new employee is something of a grafter himself and he sees a way to make some money himself out of the deal. He hurries from the office and seeking an equally unscrupulous crony, tells him that the widow's property can be bought for so much money. They can buy it and then force the real estate firm to pay them a decent profit. It happened that Jack was seated on the bench when the proposition was broached and gathered that no matter who made the profit the real estate firm, or his agent, the widow was sure to lose. He hurries to her with his information and asks her to allow him to engineer the deal.

When the agent comes to her with his proposition she refers him to Jack, stating that he had already secured an option on the property. Seeing that his chance for profit has fallen through the agent tells Jack to do business direct with the firm.

Jack calls at the real estate office and, knowing that the property is necessary to the firm to further other plans, forces his old employer to pay him full value for the property.

The disgruntled manager makes out a check and Jack hurries back to the widow with the good news. And the old sweetheart learns the full value of the man that loves her and their differences are settled.

FOR HOME AND HONOR

Champion Release, March 18

An appealing story of a trusting girl who is lured from home by a blase man of the world, with the wrong righted in the end, there being a lesson in each situation. Edward Stanton, an Englishman, lives unhappily with his wife. They having nothing in common he casts about for diversion. Out hunting one day he meets Margaret King, a beautiful and pure young country maiden and marks her for his own. His hunting trips become more frequent and he finally approaches her at the spring, where she comes for water. He wins her confidence and persuades her to elope. The wife is deserted and the couple go to Liverpool, where Stanton weds the girl, despite his previous marriage.

An accident to his first wife, however, prevents the crime of bigamy, she being thrown from a carriage and instantly killed. This accident occurs but four hours before the second nuptials. Stanton soon tires of the girl and begins a flirtation with another woman. Margaret becomes indignant and takes him to task. They quarrel; she threatens to leave him; he informs her quite coolly that she is not his legal wife. Stunned by this disclosure, Margaret leaves him and comes to America, where she becomes the wife of an estimable man whom she truly loves.

While stopping at a Washington hotel, she again meets Stanton, who is a guest of the hostelry. Again a desire to possess her is aroused within him, but Margaret, goaded to desperation at the thought of leaving her present loving husband, climbs the fire escape to the room occupied by Stanton and there demands of him to cease his persecutions under pain of death. He refuses and she shoots him. Her arrest and trial soon follow. Stanton is not dangerously wounded, and when he regains his better nature he makes a clean breast of the true facts to the court and completely exonerates Margaret. He discloses a divorce document obtained prior to Margaret's second marriage. Again the life of happiness is renewed.

IRELAND AND ISRAEL

Champion Release, March 20

Abie Wedertzky arrives in America and is an object of ridicule by the hangers on around the Battery in New York. Immediately he is surrounded by a gang of toughs, who treat him roughly until Pat Riley, a champion pugilist, providentially appears on the scene and comes to his aid, dispersing his tormentors. Abie is profuse in his thanks and there is a bond of sympathy established between the strangely assorted pair. Pat gives Abie his card and invites him to his home, where the immigrant is royally received. Abie joins a gymnasium and becomes a boxer, visits the Battery and gets revenge on his tormentors.

Later there is a boxing entertainment at the Manhattan Athletic Club, the wind-up to be a 25-round go between Riley and another for championship honors. Tom Sharkey is the referee and master of ceremonies and it is the first appearance of the celebrated pugilist in moving pictures. Abie goes on in a preliminary and is bested in a ludicrous scene. Pat is whipped at the end of four rounds and his friends all desert him, save Abie.

The years go by and Pat is reduced to poverty, while Abie prospers as a real estate dealer, having slightly changed his name. Pat is ill in bed and his family in reduced circumstances, and to make matters worse the wife is served with a writ of ejectment, the rent being in arrears. She is desperate and takes the paper to the real estate dealer and is recognized by Abie as his friend's wife. Abie accompanies her home and proves to be a ministering angel—bringing to them a basket of provisions and other necessaries. He awakens Pat and they clasp hands in a happy reunion. Abie has become the benefactor and Pat is uplifted to a happier plane.

COUNT HENRI, THE HUNTER

Solax Release, March 20

Count Henri leaves his moldering castle near the outskirts of Paris and decides to emigrate, temporarily, at least, to the land of money and heiresses. On his arrival the count is well received in American society. Had the count limited his boastful conversation to the mere recital of his family connections he would, perhaps, have been successful in getting an heiress. But the count had an imagination, and so he told his host and his new acquaintances that he was a wonderful hunter and a remarkable shot.

Some of his host's friends got wise to Henri and trumped up a plan by which he is exposed. They invite him to a hunting party so that he may have an opportunity to show his skill with the rifle.

They go out to the chase and before long one of the men, who is the rival of the count, gets one of his friends to masquerade inside a bearskin. In the course of the chase, the count meets this bear, and, of course, the first impulse of the count is to retreat to pleasanter surroundings. But the bear is not to be so easily outwitted. He pursues the flying count until in desperation the count shoots in the air. To his surprise, the count sees the bear do a somersault and then lie perfectly still. The count laboriously drags back his trophy of the hunt—and then the fun first begins.

Solax Release, March 22

Lydie Martin has trouble with her ailing child. Dr. Mann, the visiting settlement doctor and the friend of the East Side poor, does all he can to help Lydie and her sick child. Tom Martin, Lydie's husband, is out of a job and things look pretty black. The child has no chance in the atmosphere of filth and dirt. Lydie plans to take her child and her husband to the country—a place in California where a neighbor has relations—a place the neighbor speaks of very often. But there is no prospect of going; her husband is out of work and three hundred dollars are needed.

One day Dr. Mann, while making his rounds of the tenement, stops in to see the Martins, for he always makes their rooms his headquarters while in the district, because they are the cleanest. He leaves his coat and bag on a chair. Mrs. Martin is wretched. She sees visions of herself and family comfortably settled out in California, but she cannot go there. Her child will not be able to grow up strong and healthy—it will be a weakling all its life. Mrs. Martin moves about the room with unsteady and sinking spirits.

When her eyes light on the wealthy doctor's coat a sudden impulse impels her to go through the doctor's pockets. She finds his wallet, from which she removes just enough that would take her and hers to California. Just as she takes the money an evil-minded and jealous neighbor sees the act and immediately goes off to report to the police.

In the meanwhile, Lydie Martin makes hasty preparations for a departure to California, explaining to her husband that the doctor had loaned her the money. Just as she is about to go, the police break in and she is accused of theft. The doctor is brought in and he tells the police that he loaned the money to Mrs. Martin. Mrs. Martin thanks him with grateful eyes and the little family start for fresh air and happiness.

THE BETTER INFLUENCE

Majestic Release, March 17

Henry Marion, broken-hearted upon the death of his wife shortly after the birth of a baby boy, places the child with his wife's mother and mad for an entire change of existence that may help him to forget the pain and regret that the sight of every familiar place brings, moves to New York. There for five years he loses sight of his baby boy, but finds that careless living and the society of careless men and women have not brought joy nor even contentment.

He becomes practically entangled by a wily widow named Mrs. Bennet Allan, and without realizing it his finer instincts are being coarsened and lost sight of during the Bohemian parties he enjoys in her company.

A scoffing visit to a Salvation Army ball by Marion and Mrs. Allan and a gay party almost brings him to his senses, for the sight of a sweet young girl in the uniform of the Army, praying for a blessing upon the scoffers before her, makes him quiet the noisy interruptions of the party and he leads them away to finish the evening in his apartment where a telegram awaits him that his late wife's mother has suddenly died of heart disease and that he must make immediate arrangements for the care of his little son, now five years old. He fetches the boy to New York and there Mrs. Allan finds a worthy rival in an innocent child.

The boy's little fingers reach out and the Salvation Army girl is also arrayed against the forces that are disintegrating the character of the child's father, and the babe that cost the father so much at his birth is the means of preserving the finer instincts of his father and leading him into paths bathed in the pure sunshine of tender love.

LEAP YEAR

Majestic Release March 19

Any man loved by two girls is apt to find himself in an embarrassing position, but in Richard Lee's case the situation was rendered the more susceptible of trouble in that the girls were sisters and that he was in love whole-heartedly with but one of them.

After a long period of attentions which, truth to tell, had been shared by both girls, he at last mustered up courage to buy an engagement ring and prepared to ask Mabel Benton the fateful question.

Mabel, who was ready enough to make him the happiest man in the world, was sidetracked by her sister Grace, who was laboring under the erroneous impression that she was the real object of Dick's attentions, and Dick innocently, seized with chills that ever affect true lovers, neglected to state that Mabel was the girl the ring was intended for.

Grace, misunderstanding the silence, determined to help him along and bethought her of the Leap Year privilege and calmly proposed to the astounded and abashed Dick.

Mabel's heart was broken and Dick, engaged to the wrong girl, is ready to commit suicide.

Now Dick's father, exiled for business reasons ten years in Australia and unknown to the Benton family, was on his way home and Dick, thrown into contact with a tramp, of habits alcoholic, unclean and unethical, determined on a desperate expedient to force Grace to release him from his engagement. His plan of passing off the disreputable and thieving old bum as his father caused a series of complications that, while distinctly humorous, nearly landed Dick in jail, but the opportune arrival of his real parent saved the situation after Grace had repudiated her engagement and tender-hearted little Mabel had flown to Dick's rescue, no matter how terrible his father appeared.

TENDER-HEARTED MIKE

Powers Release, March 19

Billy and Ethel, happily married, are about to go to the theatre when a telegram arrives for Ethel, stating that her mother is coming for a long visit. Ethel is delighted, but poor Billy is downhearted and refuses to go out. This makes Ethel angry and a quarrel ensues, after which Billy rushes from the room using some hard words, leaving her in despair. Ethel then decides that life is not worth living and she writes a letter of farewell to Billy, turns on the gas and awaits the end. Meanwhile Billy, in another room, is doing the same thing only he selects the revolver route. It is while they are both writing that a burglar enters and finds his way to Billy's room, sneaks up behind him and reads the letter. He turns away disgusted and soon finds his way into the room where Ethel is seated, and the same scene greets him. Instantly it dawns on him that there has been a quarrel and it is then that "Tender-Hearted Mike" decides to bring them together. Going into Billy's room and holding up the would-be suicide with a gun, he backs him into the room where Ethel is seated, carrying with him Billy's farewell letter to Ethel. He then brings them face to face and compelling each to read the other's letter he makes them see their silly mistake and "make up." While they are spooning, Mike proceeds to fill his bag, even taking the rug from under their feet, and sneaks out. Entering, unobserved by the young couple, Ethel's mother announces herself and is received with ecstatic hugs and kisses by her "children." On the same reel

HER FIRST ASSIGNMENT
Powers Release, March 23

Ethel was most ambitious to become a newspaper reporter and finally, through the influence of friends, she secures an opportunity to prove what she can do. Her assignment is not a specific one, however, being general in nature and she experiences a great deal of trouble in obtaining any news. At last, just as she is on the point of giving up, she stumbles upon a chance to demonstrate to the public the ease with which the homes of the elite of the city may be entered and robbed. Surreptitiously gaining an entrance into the bachelor apartments of a wealthy clubman, she is in the act of giving a practical illustration of her theory when she is suddenly confronted by the occupant of the rooms. Then follows a most exciting and rapidly moving series of incidents, from which she emerges triumphant, leaving the unfortunate clubman in the clutches of the law, accused of robbing his own flat. Of course he is released, but does not discover the identity of the fair marauder until he reads her entertaining newspaper story in the following morning's paper, said story holding for him a particularly well-defined and all-powerful double interest.

ARABELLA BECOMES AN HEIRESS
Lux Release, March 22

Having served her master faithfully and well Arabella is ever in his thoughts, even in his dying moments. Despite the woebegone expression on his relatives' long faces, as they suddenly present themselves on hearing of his approaching death, old Moneybags chooses his old servant and leaves her all his money. The "grief-stricken" relatives appear upon the scene later and endeavor to get some of old Moneybags' legacy. They manage to get the will into their own hands through overcoming the guileless Arabella and are about to turn her out of the house when the lawyer arrives upon the scene and saves the situation. A subject dealing with the loving tenderness of relatives, it provides food for much amusement. On the same reel

IN THE BAY OF BISCAY

A photographic ramble amid the quaint little towns on the Vendean Coast. BILL HAS OWN BACK
Lux Release, March 15

Bill receives notice, while working in a hotel, that his services are no longer required. He plans with one of the housemaids, who has also been discharged, to "get his own back" on the manager of the hotel. Disguised as a wealthy traveler and his lady, the conspirators manage to get a room in the hotel from which to work sundry amusing little pranks, which result in the immediate and indignant departure of the guests. Having caused the departure of the last guest in the hotel, Bill and the housemaid depart in a lordly manner, which thoroughly deceives the bewildered manager, who retires to lament the loss of a good reputation. On the same reel

ARABELLA JOINS THE S. P. C. A.

Arabella becomes a member of the S. P. C. A. and fully realizes the responsibility of her position. She is called to prevent cruel actions being perpetrated against nearly as many animals as entered the Ark. Finally, her home strongly resembles a menagerie. However, "noblesse oblige." Her obligations certainly afford food for much humor.

EYES THAT SEE NOT
Rex Release, March 14

The labor question might have arisen when Adam was dispossessed from the Garden of Eden and insisted on an eight-hour day and a living wage, even though the only union then in existence was that of Adam and Eve. But it was not until some of earth's inhabitants wanted more of life than they needed to live that that formidable phase and phrase of modern industrial conditions arose, "the law of supply and demand."

To-day, when man has conquered nature and made it do his bidding, mouths are hungry and hands that work are stretched forth supplicating righteousness to manifest itself, and sickness steals in past the wolves at the door, and lingers because drug stores pay rent and have other expenses; lingers until death, the only institution that isn't biased or bossed by dollars, takes the freed serf to the only court where a judge can't be bought; and a smug, complacent few smile at their own happy reflections in a distorted mirror and say we live in an age of culture, of civilization, advancement. Listen, the Rex Company isn't exactly socialistic, but it's good to think the truth sometimes and tell it.

Poverty fought its barren battle there in the homes of those mill-workers. Grim destitution was their portion, and the hands that made wealth rocked hungry babes to sleep. So the leader of the mill-workers decided to go to their tyrant god and petition him to grant his slaves at least as much consideration as the machines in his mill. On the roof-garden of the palatial home he found the mill owner's wife dressed in a gown woven by the bleeding fingers of toil from the stuff of human hearts, surrounded by luxury and arrogant pomp. Her little daughter was with her, a soft little thing in white; and he thought of his own little child lying on a sick bed bequeathed by poverty, with death lurking under the cover, ready, oh, only too eager, to lead it down into the shadow. He thought of it all, his eyes saw red, and such thoughts came to his mind as make men forget their God. In maniac rage he advanced upon the woman to touch her silk and tell her it was to be the crape of his suffering child; and she, fearing the light in his eyes and the strength in his arms, hurled him away and he went toppling over the roof into the depths below.

By a miracle he lived, and by a miracle the conscience-stricken woman felt constrained to visit him. As she entered the squalor of his home, she saw a cot and a dying child upon it. The child of the poor lifted her dull eyes in wonder, not at the silks and the golden sight she beheld, but at the sympathy in the woman's face; a light of angel sweetness came to the child's eyes, and in those eyes the woman saw God.

She went back to her home, took her child into her arms, and realized that love alone was wealth. And the yellow thing that before she had called gold she gave as food for the hungry.

ers. Its dogmas and dictates are in direct contradiction and distinct competition with the doctrines of man's God; and sometimes both conflict, and sometimes, even, the woman's deity gains the mastery.

She was tired of her plain dresses and the plain story they told of wanton want; her scorned, impatient god whispered to her in the silences and urged her to mutiny. So that night she told her husband, who looked out upon the world from the standpoint of an ill paid bookkeeper, of the desire that was to be the disaster. The husband was a young man who had lived longer than his years; his eyes were bright with youth and cold with the asbes of age; and he loved his pretty young wife, loved her more than he did his soul. It was not the first time that a man has prayed to the false idols of the woman he loved; so long he sat, staring into the fireplace, and there came a thought to his mind, and an impulse to his heart, which through all the years have visited men when they desired the things that were another's. His conscience whispered to him, but it was a feeble voice, so feeble that he was not certain that he had heard it. Moreover, it was stifled by the masculine, mental challenge that he would be a coward not to commit that which his impulse suggested.

And so the next day at the office the guilty pen left a balance in the figures, and the sin was concealed under the silks it bought. The woman was happy, and in her joy he forgot the Doubt and the Thing as black as the ink with which it was secured. Like all offenders against the laws of man, he thought he would be the exception, that his act would be undetected and undiscerned. And like all offenders, he forgot the Invisible Eye.

It was discovered, and he was taken away to jail. When the wife learned the price of the money he had given her, when her slave came to say good-bye, when she saw the fortitude born of love with which he faced the barren years, when she realized that the silken gown she wore was to be the shroud of a dead manhood and the pall of slaughtered years, the child became a woman—and she understood, and renounced the devil she had called her god. She went to the judge with her woman's tears and a weeping plea, but in the stern eyes of earth's law sentiment is no extenuation. So the barred gates of hope closed behind him, and on the four stone walls he saw the Handwriting and read its message.

The years went by, and one day a woman older than her birthdays sat in the twilight, and, peering into the gloom, saw her heart reflected.

Eclair Release, March 19th

Mrs. Burt, a wealthy widow living in Philadelphia, while mourning for her dead daughter, receives a letter from her brother Charles, who suggests that she visit her nieces who have never seen her, and see whether one of them will not come and live with her, and take her daughter's place. Mrs. Burt makes the visit, but, in order to test her nieces, she conceals the fact that she is wealthy, and goes for a poor woman who must work for her living. The nieces having discharged their cook decide that the poor aunt must take her place. On the arrival she is escorted to the kitchen and put to work. All the nieces, save one, treat the aunt with coldness and rudeness. The youngest niece is kind, thoughtful and affectionate, and takes the aunt's part on all occasions. After Mrs. Burt has learned all that is necessary, she disappears. Soon after the nieces receive a letter from Uncle Charles inviting them to accompany him to Philadelphia on a trip of pleasure and education—and to meet a dear friend of his. They arrive at the beautiful home of Mrs. Burt who, surrounded by her servants and dressed in elegant apparel, greets them much to the mortification of the girls who had treated her cruelly. Mrs. Burt invites Mabel, the younger niece, to remain with her and take the place in her heart and home made vacant by the death of her daughter. The others return to New York, sadder but wiser girls.

"BLIGHTED LIVES."
Solax—March 1.

It begins tritely and has all the appearance for a few scenes of an old story, then it takes a turn for the better and develops interestingly and ends with dramatic conviction if not happily. Two men are in love with one girl and one is accepted. The successful suitor is pressed financially and his rival loans him a check accusing him of forgery when it is presented for cashing. The fiance is sent to prison. Conscience takes its turn and the rival gives monetary aid to the imprisoned man's mother. The girl learns of his kindness and marries him in the belief that the other was guilty. On the convict's release he returns home seeking vengeance on the guilty usurper, but on realizing all that his enemy had done for his mother he relents and leaves a photograph of the girl on which he writes his forgiveness of the couple. The photo is found by the wife and for the first time she learns of the guilt of her husband and she leaves him forever. This finale deserves especial praise, for it is unusual in films and true to dramatic instincts if not to all lives of such tragic experience.

CELL THIRTEEN

Great Northern Special Feature Film Company

(In two reels.)

"Cell Thirteen" is a two-reel subject which is announced by the Great Northern Special Feature Film Company to be the best thing in a drama the concern has yet offered. While it is an extra reel subject it is pregnant with strong situations, startling in the extreme. The finale embodies a dramatic climax that is an innovation—an unconventional situation that is quite unexpected and one long to be remembered for its preachment.

The story has to do with the weakness of a woman—a wife—and the blandishments of an unprincipled roue, who preys on women. Dr. Russell and his young and handsome wife, meet Marius at a hotel. Marius, who finds time hanging heavily on his hands, admires the woman and she in her weakness, yields to the blandishments of the courtly stranger, who is a polished man of the world, whereas her husband has few of the traits that fascinate silly women. It is the old story, ever new—a stolen meeting—an altogether too willing wife and her pursuer. A ball is given at the hotel at which the trio are guests, and there is a clandestine meeting and vows of love exchanged.

The doctor is suddenly summoned home to look after his affairs, as the head of a private sanitarium for the insane. The wife writes a note to Marius begging him to visit her and, with the cunning of an infatuated woman, plans the meeting. If the coast is clear she is to signal the lover. He repairs to the house, the light is burning according to the arrangements and he enters the darkened house. The arrangement of the rooms is unfamiliar to the scoundrel and he is wandering about trying to find the woman when Dr. Russell returns home, having in charge a demented man, who is hopelessly insane and violent at times. Marius accidentally stumbles on the party, but is not observed. He is alarmed and seeks some avenue of escape before his presence becomes known. He stealthily enters the insane ward, makes his way to cell No. 13 and hides under the bed.

Dr. Russell orders his attendants to place the lunatic in the strong ward for the night and he is carried into cell No. 13, unstrapped and left for the night. The door is securely fastened and the patient calms down in his supposed solitude. Marius, the intruder, thus finds himself confined with a maniac, once the patient is aroused. He dare not call for help for he cannot explain his presence, and he is terrified. He drags himself from under the bed and stealthily tries to escape. In his desperation he tugs at the door and the maniac is aroused. Springing to the floor the man with the dethroned reason grapples with his cell companion. They struggle fiercely and Marius is like a child in the hands of the maniac. The noise of the struggle reaches the corridor and an attendant hurries to call the doctor. In the meanwhile Dr. Russell has prepared to retire and sees his wife garbed to receive a guest. He is questioning her when the terrified attendant rushes into their presence and relates what he has ascertained. The wife is in abject terror. She intuitively divines that Marius is concerned. The doctor rushes away, followed by his wife. The cell is reached, the door unlocked and the man of medicine is surprised to find his casual acquaintance of the hotel on the floor overpowered by the infuriated madman. He is rescued and carried into the office, but his reason has suffered an irreparable shock. The horror of his surroundings; the attack of the madman; the struggle for life and loss of strength has made him insane. He looks about him unconscious of his surroundings, when the wife enters and with eyes dilated takes in the full import of the situation. The doctor cannot understand but connects the presence of the man in some manner with his wife. Marius sees the beautiful woman and for a second his memory partially returns. He comes to meet her and then holds out the letter written by her appointing the meeting in the night. She recognizes it and staggers to him. The husband acts and forestalls her. He gains possession of the missive and it is all made clear.

It is one of the most dramatic finales ever shown on the screen. What follows can only be conjectured. A home is wrecked and the cause of it is a hopeless madman, made so by his pursuit of the lawful wife of another. While the punishment is severe the moral pointed is a vivid preachment and, if the story may treat on an indelicate subject, the object of the producer is plain and the mission of the drama fulfilled.

FILMS SEIZED BUT THE SHOW WILL GO ON

Mr. Cohen, of Dante Pictures, Charged by Monopol Company with False Pretences

When Mr. Cohen, showing the Dante pictures at the Lyceum last evening, was accosted in an ordinary "good evening" salute, by a fair-haired, dapper and rather guileless looking young man, his thoughts were far from trouble. When the salute was followed by, "I am Frank Winch, of the Burns Detective Agency," Mr. Cohen sat up and took notice, and when the rather one-sided conversation was extended to "and general manager of the Monopol Film Company," Mr. Cohen metaphorically threw up his hands.

"And what are you going to do with me?" he asked Mr. Winch, in something of a tremble.

"Not much," replied the young man addressed, "but what do you think I ought to do with you?"

Then Constable Edwards, who accompanied Mr. Winch, served some papers on Mr. Cohen, which disclosed the charge of obtaining commission and money under false pretences.

It appears that the Monopol Film Company, who own the American and Canadian rights of the Dante's "Inferno" pictures, made in Italy, by the Milano Film Company, had leased certain territory in Canada to Margolis and Cohen, and it is also alleged that this latter concern had exceeded this privilege by coming into Nova Scotia, to which province their lease did not extend, those rights belonging to Guernsey Myers, who is also in the city on the chase.

When the object of the legal documents had been accomplished, and this was after the pictures had been shown, Constable Edwards passed the films over to Mr. Winch. The party in company with J. W. Maddin, attorney for the Monopol Film Company, and J. J. Martin, solicitor for Mr. Cohen, afterwards held a conference, which resulted in the release of Mr. Cohen on personal bail and an arrangement whereby the films will be shown at the Lyceum to-day and to-morrow afternoon and evening.

To the Record last night, Mr. Winch said that as the theatre managers were innocent parties to the arrangement he had no desire to do anything that would affect their business. The Dante films would run and "they are the best in the world" he admitted.—Sydney Record, Sydney, Cape Breton.

The Novelty Film Exchange is in a position now to supply the demands of the non-competing houses, who want some good films for a commercial price. We are situated now so that should the exhibitor desire a first or second run of film a day, we can supply them with the other two reels of so-called commercial stuff, which will give them practically a four feature film show a day.

LOS ANGELES CORRESPONDENT

Several films that were taken recently of Jim Jeffries, Ad. Wolgast, Johnny Coulon, Billy Papke and Abe Attell, which shows each of these world champions in a three-round bout, were shown last week at the Lyric to capacity business. The films proved to be clear and good, especially as they were shown at the Lyric, for the projecting work put up by Operator Earnest Geary and Assistant Ray Benson is pretty hard to beat.

After the pictures were shown at this house they were exhibited by several other showmen and proved to be of much interest to local boxing fans.

Moving pictures were also taken of the Kilbane-Attell bout, which took place on February 22.

The Lubin Company has settled down at their new home, at 1625 Fleming street, which is near Hollywood, and the work on the studio is being rapidly completed. Quite a large force has been sent here and is in charge of Mr. Harry Kelly.

It has long been known in producing circles that Santa Monica Canyon is a spot of unusual beauty and, therefore, nearly all the Western companies have taken several films in that locality.

Now the various ranch owners in that vicinity are trying to charge outrageous amounts to the producers for the privilege of taking scenes in the canyon.

As there are several companies permanently located in Santa Monica, and as the members of the said companies trade extensively with the merchants, it behooves these grouchy individuals to get wise before they lose half of the population of their enterprising (?) burg.

The New F. B. Film Exchange opened on February 19th at their quarters at 110 East Fifth street. This Exchange will buy twelve releases to start, and it is expected that the number will have to be increased in the near future.

Two of the most popular houses in the city, the Isis and the Shell, have contracted for first run service and several other theatres will use older pictures.

Mr. F. J. Balshofer, who is at the head of the Bison Company, is general manager of the new firm, and Mr. A. P. Tugwell, who is well known in local film circles, is in charge of the Exchange. The booking department is under the direction of Mr. E. L. Kennedy, who is a most capable man for that position, having been connected with Acme Film Exchange, of San Francisco, and the Los Angeles Film Exchange, for a number of years.

The Moving Picture Operators' Union, Local 150, held their annual election on February 6th and the following officers were elected: Harry Cage, president; E. R. Saunders, vice-president; Earnest Geary, recording secretary; Frank Sawyer, financial secretary; C. C. Harden, guide, and Warren Thomas, sergeant-at-arms.

The Hills Theatre, Bakersfield, Cal., has changed from Trust to Independent and the management is highly pleased with the new class of films. Service is being supplied by Miles Bros. Exchange.

By the way, talking about Miles Bros. Exchange it seems that Charles Marley, who does all the booking for that concern, now has a new fad.

It is said that Charles is now a full fledged entomologist, and it is rumored that he keeps a fine collection of rare specimens at the Exchange, among which are a dozen fine insects of the myriapod species.

Owing to an uprising in Mazatlan, Mexico, several films that Miles Bros. have shipped to Mr. Burriss, of that city, have been held up and badly delayed. To cap the climax an epidemic of smallpox has broken out in this Mexican town and the films have been quarantined and, of course, Mr. Burriss has been forced to suspend operations.

The Westlake Theatre, which changed to Trust pictures a short time ago, has again entered the ranks of the Independents. The service will again be supplied by Miles Bros. Exchange.

AMERICAN SPENDS $100,000 ON "FLYING A" PRODUCTIONS

S. S. Hutchinson, president The American Film Mfg. Co., is sponsor for the statement that during the past six months the company has spent in excess of $100,000 in advancing the character of "Flying A" productions.

A large sum of money has been invested in the new factory just completed. Every device tending toward a more refined manufacturing process that would add to the life of American film and increase its marketability has been added; every advance known to the technical handling of motion pictures has been made a part of the new equipment regardless of expense. The new studio is a distinct triumph of its kind, combining as it does, the latest and most improved ideas in stagecraft. The expensive residence property on which the factory is situated is ample evidence of this—an expensive departure intended to secure the purest of dust-free air.

The Western studio at La Mesa, So. Calif., has also come in for its share of expensive improvements. All those devices for the increased efficiency of Flying A films introduced to the Chicago plant were purchased in duplicate for the La Mesa headquarters.

Now, in addition to the sums expended in the technical departments, the American has entered upon an expensive advertising campaign intended to assist the exchange and exhibitor in creating widespread public interest in its pictures. Thousands of dollars will be spent in asking the public to call for the Flying A brand. An educational campaign that will go far toward establishing the "Flying A" in the public mind is now under way, and, it is predicted, will set a new standard of film publicity. The move is epochal and charged with extraordinary possibilities.

It is interesting to note that there is a progressive concern styled the Special Event Film Manufacturers' Co., with headquarters at No. 248 West Thirty-fifth street, that is specializing in the taking of moving pictures to order—and in accordance with modern tendencies, at short notice. They employ a staff of experts in motion picture photography and take great pride in the high character of the films that they produce. Their facilities are such that they do their own printing and developing.

AMERICAN TO RELEASE NEW SCENIC

"Winter Sports and Pastimes of Coronado Beach," the scenic American to be released Thursday, March 28th, promises some especially fine things for those lovers of the scenic film.

The pictures constituting this film were taken at an opportune time. January 1 is a big day at Coronado Beach, and while the greater part of the United States is basking beside steam radiators, California, or that part of it of which Coronado Beach is the center, is disporting itself in the warm waters by swimming races, yacht races, polo matches, automobile races, etc.

The San Diego Rowing Club is the largest organization of the kind in America, comprising some 500 members, and every New Year's Day for the past eighteen years the organization gathers at Coronado Beach, where races of every character are featured.

The American release for March 28th contains some excellent views of the famous polo match between the San Diego Club and the speedy crack Canadian team from Calgary who were present New Year's Day to settle the honors.

Nineteen entries of some of the fastest yachts in the country entered the open competition in the afternoon. The winning boat is seen crossing the line after an exciting battle for supremacy.

The opening pictures show California's famous hotels, the botanical gardens in and around the Hotel Del oronado, noted for its magnificent verandas, gardens, etc. The photography is above the average, the settings chosen with exquisite taste, and the general grouping of subjects calculated to please.

Los Angeles, Cal.—J. Wilson Wright is erecting a new theatre here which will be called the Dreamland.

THE MAJESTIC

Pictures possess all the attributes of the most popular pictures ever produced.

One of the most convincing proofs of the popularity of Majestic pictures is the splendid sale they have in Europe, where the Renters reserve the right to buy whatever pictures they like. They buy in the open market and the pictures sell strictly on merit, which assures the Exhibitor a program of quality and the public a good clean, wholesome show.

There are some Exchanges in America not buying Majestic pictures, and Exhibitors taking service from these Exchanges are being deprived of some of the best Motion Pictures ever produced—best in plot, best in acting, best in photography, and best in moral.

Therefore, if the Exhibitor wants the best and will fight for his rights, he will secure two Majestics every blessed week of his life.

TWO WEEKLY RELEASES
SUNDAY AND TUESDAY

SUNDAY, MARCH 17th, "THE BETTER INFLUENCE"—a child story of beautiful sentiment—the regeneration of a young father.

TUESDAY, MARCH 19th, "LEAP YEAR"—a timely farcical love story of complications. Do not miss "THE UNWILLING BIGAMIST"—a splendid farce comedy with a noteworthy double exposure effect.

SUNDAY, MARCH 24th, "THE ETERNAL MASCULINE"—comedy of sentiment.

TUESDAY, MARCH 26th, "OPPORTUNITY"—Comedy of Bohemian Life.

PATENT LITIGATION

THE decision handed down by the Supreme Court sustaining a patent monopoly has caused quite a number of our readers to send in searching telephone questions and letters. One in especial we quote from as follows: "Dear Saunders: Please tell me what position I am in to-day following the decision of the Supreme Court. Have the Patents Company a monopoly on the moving picture business in this country now, and must I become a licensed exhibitor to get a living? For God's sake, tell me, and others who are in a like condition, what we can do!"

In reply to this we can only say, in the words of one of the old generals, "Trust in God and keep your powder dry." There is really little to trouble you in the decision handed down. Regarding the shoe machinery case, we are inclined to side with Chief Justice White in his dissent from the decision of the majority. We consider he is by far the most sensible and clear-seeing of the bench.

Another point to be taken into consideration is the fact that the shoe machinery men had sustained their patents, while the Patents Company have not sustained theirs in any court in the land; consequently they cannot claim under these patents, and, as we understand the question to-day, a full, complete defense will be made against any cases brought against the users of Independent film. The Sales Company guarantee this.

While we are penning this editorial we are hoping to receive a legal opinion on the question. We feel assured, as we have told our readers many times in the past, that the Patents Company are an illegal monopoly for the restraint of a beautiful educational industry, combined with art, that ought to be as free as air, and we have as yet had no reason to change our opinion on this question. To put some of our readers more at their ease, we extract from the Tribune of March 13th the leading editorial, which covers the case well and completely:

Criticism of the Chief Justice

Chief Justice White, in his earnest dissent from Monday's decision of the Supreme Court sustaining a patent monopoly, recognizes the virtue of criticism of judicial decisions. He gives as one of the reasons for using the extraordinarily sharp language which he employs regarding the opinion of the majority the hope that his course may lead to narrowing the application of the decision in the future and that it may serve to call attention to the need of legislative action. His criticism is already being justified by the results. Congress is showing an interest in the situation and steps are being taken toward securing a rehearing of the patent case before a full bench, when it is hoped that the four judges who made up Monday's majority will be found in a minority. Public interest, moreover, has been aroused by the Chief Justice's vigorous words, and there is good reason to think that in one way or another defects in the patent laws will be cured.

The criticism in this instance possesses extraordinary force, coming from the Chief Justice. It is an example of the kind of criticism of which more is needed in this country—authoritative, unbiassed, fair, but none the less forceful. If it has the effect either of bringing about a rehearing and reversal or a change in the law or a restriction of the decision in future interpretations the court will be in a great deal better position before the public than if yesterday's decision had been allowed to pass almost unnoticed and little understood, and when the ill effects which the Chief Justice forebodes came to be felt the public had been told that they all sprang from a decision of the Supreme Court rendered some time previously.

Proper criticism of the courts is one of the most delicate of functions, yet there can be no doubt that its effects are wholesome. Had there been more of it in the past it is probable that the courts would have been kept in closer sympathy with present day ideals than they are. The force of public criticism in securing good government from the legislative and executive departments and in keeping them truly representative is universally recognized. The judicial department alone has been left measurably free from criticism, partly because there are times and seasons when comment on the work of courts is improper, as, for example, during the progress of a trial, and partly because intelligent criticism is difficult to any but members of the bar, and they have been naturally reluctant.

The result of not having enough criticism of the right sort in the past is the present reaction, which is bringing a good deal of criticism of the wrong sort and even irresponsible attacks and wild condemnation, while leading some persons to look with favor upon crude schemes to substitute public clamor and passion for calm, judicial action.

In reply to another question, "Do we think the decision will hold?" we reply emphatically, No, we do not. We think that every right-minded, honest citizen throughout the States will rise up and protest against such a far-reaching, wide-sweeping decision. It simply means if such a decision can be sustained that the very stove a man uses in his house, if the patentee wishes, shall only burn a certain quality of coal sold by a person whom the patentee licenses to sell;—the very music one plays on the piano, or the Angelus, or any other musical instrument, if it is patented, shall use only such and such a selection specially notified by the patentee of the article; the very water that one uses must be dominated by the patentee of a faucet, and so on ad infinitum.

To the moving picture industry all we can say is, do not be over-worried, but go on as you have been going, trust in justice and truth prevailing over injustice and falsehood.

THE MOVING PICTURE BOOTH

On another page in this issue will be found drafts of bills before the Assembly at Albany chiefly referring to New York State. We want every exhibitor in the State to write his Assemblyman and Senator voicing his desire for the bills of relief to the present unjust conditions to go through so that they may not have to wait another twelve months for further action. It is very urgent that immediately on receipt of this copy of the Moving Picture News each one interested sit down and write a letter off at once. Do not delay under any consideration, unless you wish to be placed in the position of having to substitute asbestos at a very high price for your sheet-metal booth. There are two bills before the House at Albany, one drawn up by the sheet-metal industry and the other by the Censorship Board of New York City. Our preference is fully in favor of the sheet-metal workers, owing to the fact that it is more to the interest of the exhibitor, drafted by practical and responsible men. It is a pity the two bills were submitted; if they can be merged into one bill embodying the good points of each we think it would be wise. However, let our readers judge which they want and act immediately.

ON TO DAYTON, OHIO

MARCH 26th and 27th are to be special red-letter days for the exhibitors of Ohio at their Dayton convention. Every exhibitor in the State who can get there should be present to take part in the deliberations of the assembly. Points of interest will come up of vast importance to them in the industry. Conditions are arising thick and fast which will need the full, concerted strength of every man in the association to combat. From an educational standpoint the convention will be an eye-opener. Looking in our present issue at the menu of good things provided, they will see for themselves that it is worth their while to be in attendance. (By the way, the article in last issue is attributed to Mr. Huss, the secretary. This should have been Mr. M. A. Neff, the national president, to whom all credit goes.)

Mr. Neff is straining every effort, with the assistance of the county authorities, to make this meeting a grand success. We have no doubt whatever that he will succeed beyond his expectations. At the same time we want to urge everyone to be present at this meeting. Don't leave it to the other fellow, but be there yourself.

Cincinnati, O., March 12, 1912.

Alfred H. Saunders,
Editor, Moving Picture News.

Dear Sir:

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of the State of Ohio extends to every exhibitor in the United States, whether they be a member of the League or not, an invitation to come to Dayton and meet the other exhibitors and enjoy themselves. While this is to be a State convention, exhibitors are coming from all parts of the United States and it will be the biggest convention ever held by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. A plate will be reserved at the banquet for all visiting exhibitors, covers already having been arranged for not less than six hundred (600), and we hope to make it a thousand. While this is an Ohio convention, at the same time Ohio wants to become acquainted with all the exhibitors throughout the United States, and we want them all to come to Ohio and be our guests. We want to fully demonstrate to every exhibitor that our organization is a business organization built upon a permanent foundation for the benefit of the exhibitors and the public. The organization is for the purpose of uplifting of the motion picture business and placing it upon the high plane where it belongs, and it cannot help but be a great benefit not only to the exhibitors and the public but to everyone connected with the motion picture business.

A large number of exhibitors will come from the following states: Illinois, Wisconsin, Indiana, Michigan, Kentucky, Pennsylvania, New York, West Virginia, Alabama, and we expect representatives from as far west as California and also as far East as Massachusetts, as we have letters stating that they will be at Dayton. The Committee at Dayton has a sufficient amount of money now on hand to pay for the big entertainment.

Following is the program:

On March 25th, at 8 o'clock p.m. the directors of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America will meet in special session for the purpose of transacting national business affairs. Every officer of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America will be present.

On March 26th at 10 o'clock a.m. all the League members and visiting exhibitors will meet at the Auditorium Theatre, a short session will be held for the purpose of appointing committees, etc. While the business session is going on an automobile ride will be given the ladies and visitors, sight-seeing Dayton, the National Soldiers' Home will be visited, also every place of interest.

At 2 o'clock p.m. an automobile parade will start from the Auditorium Theatre to the big hall at the National Cash Register works, which is now being decorated for the occasion. Moving pictures of this parade will be taken and it is expected that every automobile in Dayton and the surrounding vicinity will be in the parade. Arriving at the Cash Register Hall the convention will assemble where they will hear short speeches by statesmen, prominent exhibitors, newspaper writers and manufacturers.

At 4 o'clock a trip through the National Cash Register Works, by those who wish to go will be taken. Those who wish to see the machinery will have an opportunity as it will be on display. The latest creations in musical instruments, electrical engines and in fact, all kinds of machinery used in the motion picture business.

At 5 o'clock p. m. kinemacolor and feature pictures will start; they will run all evening for those who wish to see them.

At 8 o'clock p. m. a musical and high-class vaudeville entertainment will be given for the enjoyment of the visitors. On the morning of the 27th, at 9 o'clock, several of the stores in Dayton will give a special entertainment to the lady visitors.

At 10 o'clock a. m. The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League will be called to order at the big convention hall for the purpose of transacting business, where motion pictures will be taken of the members of the league. At night a big banquet will be given, all arrangements having been made and the money now on hand, with which to entertain every visiting exhibitor and his family.

E. W. WAUGH
National Vice-President, Huntington, W. Va., who will be at Dayton on the 26th and 27th.

We again call the attention of every exhibitor throughout the country to the fact that while this is a State convention we want to make your acquaintance and have a good time; we will show the world that we are business men and not asleep, and that we are a part of this great commercial country.

Cinematography is making the most rapid progress of any business in the world, and you as an exhibitor must be progressive and keep up with the procession or you will get so far behind that you never will catch up. Focus your mind on Dayton, where the big doings will take place and do not fail to be there.

President M. P. E. L. of America.

GOOD NEWS FOR SCENARIO WRITERS

The Reliance Company have made an advance movement, one that will do full justice to authors and writers. We have long contended that scenario writers should have their names attached to their work. The Reliance Company will in future place the name of the author of their story on the film. Good for Reliance! Who will follow?

NEW FILM EXCHANGE HEAD

Mr. I. A. DeSomers who has been sales manager of the Western Film Exchange of Milwaukee the past few years, and served in various other capacities since the organization, has been appointed manager of the Western Film Exchange of Kansas City, Mo., by J. R. Frouler, owner, to take effect March 5th.

Mr. DeSomers has a complete and thorough understanding of every branch of film exchange work, having had considerable experience in all departments, working his way up from the bottom. His knowledge and efficiency in this work offer the company complete assurance of a successful career.

His many friends in the Northwest will watch the progress of his work with interest, and feel that his pleasing manner will no doubt win for him as many new friends in the new territory.

LENTEN FEATURES

During the Lent season, moving picture exhibitors should endeavor to furnish their patrons with suitable Lenten subjects and should exhibit pictures that are appropriate for the occasion.

Notable among this year's offerings for Lent are the beautiful feature slides produced by the Novelty Slide Company of New York. They have issued such interesting subjects as the Passion Play, Wonderful Rome, Papal Consistory, Stations of the Cross, Milton's Paradise Lost, Dante's Inferno and Jerusalem and the Holy Lands.

These slides have met with popular approval wherever exhibited, and enterprising theatre owners have played to capacity houses with these highly interesting and beautifully colored works of slide art.

Seattle, Wash.—Rufus Merriam, of Spokane, has announced that $100,000 will be expended on the erection of a two-story theatre at Howard street and First avenue. Seating capacity 1,000.

Hoboken, N. J.—The Lyceum Theatre Company, of this place, recently organized with a capital of $105,000, will erect a new theatre at Broadway and East Thirty-eighth street, Bayonne, N. J.

Indianapolis, Ind.—Benj. V. Barton and Chas. Olson will erect a new moving picture theatre at 135-9 North Illinois street, at a cost of $50,000.

Philadelphia, Pa.—Hopkins & Milgram are planning the erection of a new theatre at South and Leithgow streets.

"A DEAD MAN'S CHILD"

(In three reels)

Great Northern Special Feature Film Co.

"A Dead Man's Child," is a story quite out of the ordinary in which startling situations and denouements follow one another quickly and in logical sequence to make it a drama in which the interest is not allowed to lag for an instant, and expectancy is maintained from the opening to the close.

The story plot is one of the strongest that can be conceived and cleverly worked out in an elaborate manner with an exceptionably capable cast of actors.

The Count, who is well along in years, makes a will in favor of his daughter, Edith, and her fiance, Baron Sternberg. They are called into his study and informed of the provisions of the instrument and then dismissed. The Count has a lifelong friend, Pendleton, who lives in an adjoining house and they have communicated with each other by the means of a secret subterranean passage way. The Count repairs to his room, locks the door, and pays a visit to his friend by the means of the underground passage. He tells Pendleton a secret, of which the young couple are ignorant—that in case his daughter dies without issue the estate will revert to Pendleton—and the latter is elated.

In returning to his house the Count falls down the steps and is seriously injured and soon dies. Then Pendleton sets about it to remove the obstacles that stand between him and a fortune, and he goes about it cunningly—deliberately. He engages the services of an Oriental doctor—a criminal whose specialty is secret poisons—and he enters into the plans with devilish cunning. Pendleton arranges to have the Oriental doctor at the marriage of Edith and the Baron, and the accomplice succeeds in injecting a narcotic poison in a rose. Edith smells it and is overcome. She is removed to her room and subsequently the doctor, by means of a secret panel in the wall, administers a powerful drug in her medicine and she is reduced to a comatose state in which she remains for four days. She is supposed to be dead and is placed in a casket in the family vault.

Pendleton and the Oriental remove her body and take it to the home of Pendleton, where the girl is revived by the doctor. Pendleton attempts to force his attentions upon her but is repulsed. In the meantime an old servant has gone to the vault to deposit flowers on the casket of his supposedly dead mistress, and discovers the body has been removed and reports the matter to the bereaved husband, who employs a detective in Newton, one of the most expert sleuths to be secured. Pendleton arranges with the doctor to take Edith to Constantinople, and she overhears the plans and scratches a note on the window of her prison room with the diamond in her ring.

Pendleton is anxious to have the Baron removed and the Oriental schemes to bring about this end. Newton visits the home of the Baron, takes measurements, and then places himself in the bed usually occupied by the Baron. He has not long to wait for a secret panel at the head of the bed slides back and the hideous face of the Oriental doctor appears. Stealthily he extends an arm through the aperature in which is held a knife. He raises it to stab the sleeper when he is seized. A struggle ensues but the doctor makes his escape and is followed down the secret passageway where a battle between the fleeing villian and the officers takes place. The Baron is wounded and the doctor makes his escape through the trap door which is soon splintered by the police, to find the room empty and the girl and her captors gone. Newton reads the message on the window pane and gets into action. Pendleton and his accomplice rush to the railroad station, board a train and are gone when the officers arrive.

Newton starts in pursuit in a fast motor car, and arrives at an overhead bridge ahead of the train. He climbs on the bridge and, as the swiftly moving train passes under, he leaps and lands on the roof. He exchanges clothing with the guard and enters the compartment where the conspirators have their charge. He is attacked by the Oriental and they struggle out on the platform. It is one of the most exciting situations ever shown in moving pictures. The Oriental is finally overpowered and hurled from the fast-moving train.

Edith is restored to her huband who is overjoyed to see her and the drama has a happy finale.

WHAT PERSEVERANCE DID FOR A MAN

By Margaret I. MacDonald

Charles Urban was the man. Kinemacolor was the result of his perseverance. A good head, plenty of common sense, and a bull-dog tenacity are the attributes that have been instrumental, more than all others, in placing him where he is to-day, king of motion picture photography.

It has been said that Charles Urban "caught Nature napping." Perhaps he did. However, he has shown the world two of the most important discoveries in photography that it has ever known: First, that objects can be photographed in their natural colors, and second that the photograph after it has been successfully taken and developed can by a certain simple method of filtering, be projected on the screen in such a manner as to give the human eye a satisfactory reproduction of the object in its natural shadings.

Mr. Urban is still a young man, but there is a great lesson to be learned in the careful study of his life up to the present stage of his career.

"There is a tide in the affairs of man, which, taken at its flood leads on to fortune." Thus has it been with Charles Urban. When opportunity knocked at his door he listened and obeyed. A stationery retail merchant in Detroit, Mich., he was induced to take an agency for the Densmore typewriter. Selling a fabulous number of these machines in an extremely short time, he became by reason of his success as a salesman, an exponent of the phonograph at its entry on the market. Then came the vitascope, a tremendously heavy affair which took about as much electricity as it was worth to run it, and Mr. Urban incidentally became interested in the manipulation of this machine. "After this," said he, "no more typewriters for me—the motion picture fascinated me, and I have stayed with it ever since."

Ten years ago kinemacolor did not know its own name. The discoverer of the basic idea, a man by the name of Turner, died ere he was permitted to develop the embryo of a great invention. Mr. Smith and Mr. Urban bought out the Turner interest and went to work on nothing but a crude framework of the wonderful science being so beautifully demonstrated to us at the present day. Hope was high in the hearts of these two young men as they started out together for the coveted goal. But alas! discouragement after discouragement challenged them. Many a time they hopelessly dropped their task and sat staring hopelessly at each other. Year after year went by with no better result than had been accomplished in the last. At the end of the sixth year they threw down their tools, buttoned up their coats and, flayed by the conquering arm they walked disconsolately away.

Close observation of Charles Urban as you sit opposite to him in conversation tells you that he is a man of indomitable courage, will power, and perseverance. There is that in the glance of his eye, in the general poise of both his physical and mental system which makes you unconsciously grip a little harder at thought of him as a competitor. And so before he had gone far on the road of retreat he shrugged his shoulders, put his hands in his pockets and turned him about again. Slowly he sauntered back to the workshop, this time alone. He settled himself on a bench hard by, dropped his head in his hands and proceeded to think at the knotty problem again with a steam engine energy. He closed his ears to all but that still small voice within him which kept right on singing, "You've got something, old boy, keep at it! You've got something, old boy, keep at it!" He kept at it, and the result has been the recording in natural colors of events and scenes of such magnificence as may never again be witnessed in the history of the human race.

The most subtle secret of kinemacolor is not in the photographing of the object in its natural colors but the projection of the picture in those same colors under artificial light. Urban found that he must utilize the entire spectrum instead of working with three colors as had heretofore been done. He found also that he must work in conjunction with the artificial light if the picture was to be projected under the artificial light. He found also that the human eye had a secret of its own in the way of blending color, that by the filtering of light through certain shades and colors in alternation at a certain point of the vision certain satisfactorily effects could be produced.

Kinemacolor is the direct result of systematic, persevering, intelligent work, the object of which was the proper demonstration of a known fact. Four years from the time of the satisfactory completion of the experiment Charles Urban, at the head of the Kinemacolor Company, was being entertained at one of the most gorgeous functions of modern times by the British Government. At the Delhi Durbar kinemacolor was represented at its private camp by twenty tents, ten automobiles, and cameras and camera men galore, with Charles Urban himself as supervisor of the entire delegation.

To-day kinemacolor is known throughout the globe as the marvel of the age. Bernhardt, Rejane, and other notables of the profession have expressed their willingness to pose for kinemacolor, that not alone form and expression but the real live tint of their skin may go filmed to the halls of fame for posterity to view.

OPERATOR ON TOP OF DURBAR STAND

There is a wondrous fascination in the gray brown of the distant meadows, or the hazy blue of the far-away hills; there is an allurement in the waterfall, or the iridescent rainbow; there is a vividness in the quiver of the foliage, the life-like sheen of the horses, and the polish of their trappings, which no other process of photography has been able to give us.

The ambitious character of the man is told in his answer to my question, "Do you feel that you have come to a definite conclusion with regard to kinemacolor, or do you feel that there is still something to be done to make perfect this wonderful discovery you have made?"

"Oh," said he, "there is still a great deal to be done—I am not resting on my oars by any means. I am still working to further perfect machinery that is as perfect as we know now how to make it."

Charles Urban has written his name in large letters upon the history of this century. His is the reward of the man who persevered.

"JACK" CONWAY

The great attractiveness of the Western pictures as produced by the Nestor Film Company, under the nonpareil direction of Milton H. Fahrney, has been enhanced of late months by the delightful personality and splendid acting of "Jack" Conway. This young, experienced and versatile actor has already won a host of admirers wherever Nestor pictures are shown, and his popularity bids fair to outrival that of any prime favorite now appearing in the silent drama. Mr. Conway fits in photo-plays better than any actor we've ever seen, being gifted with intelligence, dramatic talent, pantomimic ability, fine presence and possessing all the athletic accomplishments necessary to a successful motion picture player. At Hollywood, Cal., where the Nestor studios are located, Mr. Conway enjoys the reputation of being one of the most popular members of the Nestor Film Company.

KINEMACOLOR'S PROGRESS

SIDE LIGHTS ON THE CINEMATOGRAPH

The Press and the Motion Picture: A Scandalous Attack and a Challenge

By Leonard Donaldson

I don't know whether the name and "fame" of a weekly journal entitled John Bull has reached my American cousins. However this may or may not be—it matters not. For some considerable time now the four quarters of the London metropolis have been startled by the announcement, "Shocking Secret Cinematograph Shows," and, more recently, "Shocking Sin-ematograph Shows." Now, it should be known that the periodical in question unfortunately enjoys a very considerable circulation which has made it all the more damaging to the English picture theatre.

An attempt has been made to arouse the public mind in respect of "disgusting orgies," which this journal asserts are "nightly held in the West End of London." These orgies are, it is suggested, the outcome of "indecent cinematograph films" imported from Paris and exhibited to pander to the morbid taste and lewd appetites of certain visitors to such exhibitions, who, we are assured, pay "anything from half a guinea to a guinea" a head for the privilege (?) of witnessing disgusting pictures. It was stated that pictures of this nature "are being exhibited in several places in the West End and West Central parts of London"; that, in fact, such "shows" represent "a settled and organized business." This, of course, is all very dreadful, if it were true or had not been greatly exaggerated. In a densely populated city such as London, whose inhabitants are composed of all sorts —including the scum of most nationalities—vice of all kinds is undoubtedly to be found, including probably "filthy films." But that the evil has attained the dimensions this sensational "sheet" suggests I do not believe. Nor am I, or anyone else connected with the English film business, for the matter of that, inclined to credit the statement that the police are aware of the existence of these places, but are more or less powerless owing to the difficulty of getting direct evidence. If John Bull can obtain direct "evidence," why not the police? or why did not the journal place the evidence it possesses at the disposal of the police? It is all very well to say, "It is impossible for obvious reasons to give particulars of persons, places and circumstances," but I confess I fail to see the obviousness! Particulars such as it said cannot be given, if they were published, would of a certainty bring the places to which the particulars applied to a speedy termination. Even if it was not deemed advisable to publish these particulars, why not have handed them over quietly to the police, instead of placarding London with sensational, alliterative posters anent "Shocking Secret Cinematograph Shows," with "Filthy Films" as an alliterative sub-head for the article on the subject? The information that these "shows" are "usually in a quiet street just off a main thoroughfare" did not help us much. All I can say—and I have made a diligent search—is that I have not up to the moment located one. That, I admit, is not conclusive evidence that they do not exist, but I confess to being a trifle skeptical on that head. What the journal in question apparently fails to comprehend is that even if the police cannot obtain direct evidence as to "filthy films," the places exhibiting such come under the provisions of the Cinematograph Act, and the officials of the London County Council have never shown themselves averse to moving where the provisions of that act, and the authority of the Council, have been infringed. John Bull should have been a little more precise and communicative either to its readers or to the authorities. If "filthy films" are exhibited nightly in London in "scores of places," no persons will be more ardent to suppress such films, and to get those responsible for such disgraceful exhibitions put under state protection, than those engaged in exhibiting, making and supplying films that are not contaminated. My readers will perhaps wonder why I have referred to all this in the past tense. The reason is that the series of sensational articles has now ceased. I will not be so egotistical as to claim that it was only through my actions, but I do believe that the discontinuance of the scandal was in no small measure due to the offer I made the proprietors of John Bull to conduct a campaign having as its object the elimination of these "Secret Shows," and the bringing to justice those responsible for their existence. The exact nature of my challenge I will make the subject of my next article.

ARE LOVE SCENES ESSENTIAL?

This question is prompted by an incident which was related to the writer a day or two ago. A person prepared a scenario which seemed to the writer to possess more than ordinary merit. It was upon a theme which illustrated certain phases of American history, more clearly, perhaps, than the average historic film.

It was sent out to one firm and was returned, not because it was bad, or was unsuited to production because of its difficulty. None of these reasons influenced the decision. It was solely because there were no love scenes in it. Yet, the subject itself was romantic and there was sufficient romance to hold the interest from beginning to end. It would have been impossible to introduce a love scene without violating the spirit of the film.

It is out now under consideration by another house. Perhaps its fate will be more encouraging. If it is not there will arise an interesting question.

Does the public require a love scene to make it interested in a picture? The comedy doesn't always have it, and there is no question about the popularity of comedies. The travelogue seldom has such scenes, yet it is always popular. The industrial manages to struggle through without love scenes and the scenic gets over without difficulty. Why, then, is it necessary to insert love scenes to supply romance in historical films? Some are improved by it, but unless the subject requires it, or unless the subject selected had a love scene originally, it would be far wiser to leave out all such allusions. Your film is weakened and not strengthened by the addition.

Practically all events of historic importance are dramatic. And this is especially true if they represent any particular development or change in a nation or a country. If a love scene is introduced it weakens the main story by detracting from the principal theme. It is better to concentrate upon the subject and reproduce, as accurately as circumstances admit, the actual event. Then there will be no misunderstanding and those who see it will derive no false impression from the picture.

Love stories are proper and good ones are, and of right should be, popular, but it is scarcely essential to introduce love scenes in every historic tale merely because someone else has done it. Break away and be original. Release some stories without these episodes. Introduce actual characters in such dramatic situations, as you can easily do, and the audience will not miss the love-making which often has occurred in pictures of this type. Make the films live with human interest, and the mere fact of one or two making love will scarcely be an element of importance in this direction. It is time for a change, and some enterprising producer should make the change. Others would see the advantages soon enough and follow. Unless such a thing actually formed a part of a historic episode it should not be included in the film presentation.

METAL VS. ASBESTOS BOOTHS

March 1, 1912.

Mr. Saunders,
Editor, Moving Picture News,
30-32 West 13th Street, New York.

Dear Sir:

Enclosed please find copy of the bill to the New York Legislature, looking to the restoration of sheet metal for use in the construction of moving picture booths.

Last summer the asbestos interests caused a bill to be passed by the New York State Legislature requiring asbestos board to be used in the construction of moving picture booths, since which time sheet metal contractors have been shut out from this lucrative branch. In conjunction with The Sheet Metal Shop of New York we have taken up this matter and are endeavoring to have this law repealed and to have sheet metal restored to its former position as a logical material from which to construct these moving picture booths. This journal has drawn a bill which is to be introduced this coming week into the New York State Legislature, and has called upon all sheet metal workers to co-operate with them in furthering the passage of this bill. As we are considerable users of your products, we ask that you co-operate in this matter by having your New York representatives in the various parts of the state communicate with any state senator or assemblyman they can reach and endeavor to stir up interest in this measure.

Thanking you in advance for your co-operation, we remain,

Very truly yours,
SHARLOW BROS. CO.,

§ (210) 211. Construction of booth; approval of plans and specifications. The booths provided for in section two hundred and (nine) ten of this article shall be constructed according to plans and specifications which shall have been first approved, in a city, by the mayor or chief executive officer of the city department having supervision of the erection of buildings in such city; in a village, by the president of such village; in a town outside the boundaries of a city or village, by the supervisor of such town. Provided, however, that no plans and specifications for the construction of such booths shall be approved by any public official, unless the following requirements are substantially provided for in such plans and specifications.

2. General specifications. Such booth shall be constructed with a frame work of iron angles not less than one and one-quarter inches by one and one-quarter inches by three-sixteenths of an inch thick, the adjacent iron members being joined firmly with angle plates of iron. The iron members of the frame work shall be spaced not more than four feet apart on the sides and not more than three feet apart on the front and back and top of such booth. The sheet metal, asbestos board, or other fire-resisting material provided for in section two hundred and (nine) ten of this article shall completely cover the sides, top and all joints, of such booth. If sheet metal be used, it shall be of not less than number twenty United States standard gauge. If any other fire-resisting material be used t (T)he sheets of such fire-resisting material shall be at least one-quarter of an inch in thickness; and in either case shall be securely attached to the iron frame work by means of iron bolts or rivets. The floor space occupied by the booth shall be covered completely with cement of not less than one-half inch in thickness, (said fire-resisting material not less than three-eighths of an inch in thickness). There shall be provided for the booth a door not less than two feet wide and six feet high, consisting of an angle iron frame covered with (sheets of said fire-resisting material one-quarter of an inch thick) the same material as is used for the top and sides of the booth, and attached to the frame work of the booth by hinges, in such a manner that the door shall be kept closed at all times, when not used for ingress or egress.

When the windows are open, the shutters shall be so suspended and arranged that they will automatically close the window openings, upon the operating of some suitable fusible or mechanical releasing device. Each booth shall be provided with any opening on top for ventilation. Said opening shall be not less than twelve by sixteen inches and shall be provided with a door of the same material as is used for the top and sides of the booth, arranged so that in case of fire it will automatically close the opening upon the operating of some suitable fusible or mechanical releasing device. All sides and top of booth shall be at least six inches from the nearest woodwork.

§ 4. Section two hundred and eleven of said article and chapter is hereby re-numbered section two hundred and twelve, and amended to read as follows:

§ (211) 212. Inspection; certificate. After the construction of such booth shall have been completed, the public officer charged herein with the duty of passing upon the plans and specifications therefor shall within three days after receipt of notice in writing that such booth has been completed cause such booth to be inspected. If the provisions of sections two hundred and (nine) ten and two hundred and (ten) eleven have been complied with, and if, in the judgment of such public officer such booth is otherwise constructed in a manner so as to render safe the operation of apparatus for projecting moving pictures, such public officer shall issue to the owner or lessee of the premises wherein such booth is situated a certificate stating that the provisions of sections two hundred and (nine) ten and two hundred and (ten) eleven of this article has been complied with.

Assembly, No. 1232.

§ 5. Section two hundred and twelve of said article and chapter is hereby re-numbered section two-hundred and thirteen and inserted herein unchanged to read as follows:

§ (212) 213. Penalty for violating this article. The violation of any of the provisions of this article shall constitute a misdemeanor. This act shall not apply to cities which have local laws or ordinances now in force which provide for fireproof booths of any kind for moving picture machines or apparatus.

§ 6. Nothing in this act contained shall in any wise affect any prosecution or proceedings now pending.

§ 7. This act shall take effect immediately.

THE BILL AS DRAWN UP BY MAYOR GAYNOR'S COMMITTEE

The People of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

Article 12A. Public Entertainments or Exhibitions by the Cinematograph or any other apparatus for projecting moving pictures.

Section 209. Fireproof booth for cinematograph or any other apparatus for projecting moving pictures.

Section 210. Construction of booth; approval of plans and specifications.

Section 211. (Section 211. Inspection, certificate.) This Article not retroactive under certain conditions.

Section 212. (Section 212. Penalty for violating this article, Section 211.) Inspection certification for permanent booth.

Section 213. Portable booth for temporary exhibitions.

Section 214. Exemption and requirements for Miniature Cinematograph machines.

Section 209. Fireproof Booth for Cinematograph or any Other Apparatus for Projecting Moving Pictures. No cinematograph or other apparatus for projecting moving pictures, save as excepted in Secs. 211 and 213 of this article, which apparatus uses combustible films of more than ten inches in length, shall be set up for use or used in any building, place or public assemblage or entertainment, unless such apparatus for the projection of moving pictures shall be enclosed therein in a booth or enclosure constructed of (iron frame work covered or lined with asbestos board or with some equally strong and fire-resisting material), concrete, brick, hollow tile, or other approved fireproof material, or any approved fireproof frame work covered or lined with asbestos board or some other approved fire-resisting material, and unless such booth shall have been constructed as provided in Section 210 of this article, and the inspection provided in (Section 211) Section 212 shall have been issued to the owner or lessee of the premises where each booth is situated.

Section 210. Construction of Booths: Approval of Plans and Specifications. The booths provided for in Section 209 of this article shall be constructed according to plans and specifications which shall have been first approved, in a city, by the mayor or chief executive officer of the city department having supervision of the erection of buildings in such city; in a village, by the president of such village; in a town outside the boundaries of a city or village, by the supervisor of such town. Provided, however, that no plans and specifications for the construction of such booth shall be approved by any public official, unless the following requirements are substantially provided for in such plans and specifications:

1. Dimensions. Such booth shall be at least (seven) six feet in height. If one machine is to be operated in such booth the floor space shall not be less than forty-eight square feet. If more than one machine is to be operated therein, an additional twenty-four feet shall be provided for each additional machine.

2. General Specifications. In case such booth is not constructed of concrete, brick, hollow tile, or other approved fireproof material than asbestos, such booth shall be constructed with (a framework of angle irons) an angle framework of approved fireproof material, the angles to be not less than one and one-quarter inches by one and one-quarter inches by three-sixteenths of an inch thick, the adjacent (iron) members being joined firmly with angle plates of metal. The angle members of the framework shall be spaced not more than four feet apart on the sides and not more than three feet apart on the front and back and top of such booth. (This fire-resisting material provided for in Section 209 of this article shall completely cover the sides, tops and joints of such booth.) The sheets of (such) asbestos board or other approved fire-resisting material attached to said framework shall be at least one-quarter of an inch and shall be securely attached to the (iron) framework by means of (iron metal bolts or rivets). The fire-resisting material shall completely cover the sides, tops, and all joints of such booth. The floor space occupied by the booth shall be covered with (said) fire-resisting material not less than three-eighths of an inch in thickness. The booth shall be insulated so that it will not conduct electricity to any other portion of the building. There shall be provided for the booth a door not less than two feet wide and (six feet) five feet ten inches in height, consisting of (an angle iron frame) an angle frame of approved fireproof material covered with sheets of (said fire-resisting) approved fireproof material one-quarter of an inch thick, and attached to the framework of the booth by hinges in such a manner that the door shall be kept closed at all times when not used for ingress or egress.

The operating windows, one for each machine to be operated therein and one for the operator therein, shall be no larger than reasonably necessary to secure the desired service, and shutters of (said fire-resisting) approved fireproof material shall be provided for each window. When the windows are open, the shutters shall be suspended and arranged that they will automatically close the window openings upon the operating of some suitable fusible or mechanical releasing device.

Where a booth is so built that it may be constructed to open directly on the outside of the building through a window, such window shall be permitted for the benefit of the operator, but such booth shall not be exempted from the requirements of the installation of a vent-flue as hereinafter prescribed. Said booth shall contain an approved fireproof box for the storage of films not on the projecting machine. Films shall not be stored in any other place on the premises; they shall be rewound and repaired either in the booth or in some other fireproofed enclosure.

The booth in which the picture machine is operated shall be provided with an opening in its roof or upper part of its side-wall leading to the outdoor air. The vent-flue shall have a minimum cross-sectional area of fifty square inches and shall be fireproof. When the booth is in use, there will be a constant current of air passing outward through said opening or vent-flue, at the rate of not less than thirty cubic feet per minute.

Inspection Certificate. This article not retroactive under certain conditions. Section 211. Sections 209 and 210 of this article shall not be retroactive for any booth approved by appropriate public authority or official prior to this act taking effect, provided such booth have or be so reconstructed of the same material as to have dimensions in Section 210 of this article as specified; provided such booth conform to the specifications of Section 210 as regards vent-flue, box for storage of films, specifications for rewinding and repairing films, specifications for windows and doors, and provided such booth be of rigid fireproof material, and be insulated so as not to conduct electricity to any other part of the building and be so separated from any adjacent combustible material as not to communicate fire through intense heat in case of combustion within the booth.

Section 212. (Section 212. Penalty for violating this Article.) Inspection, certificate for permanent booths. After the construction of such booth shall have been completed, the public officer charged herein with the duty of passing upon the plans and specifications therefor shall within three days after receipt of notice in writing that such booth has been completed cause such booth to be inspected. If the provisions of Sections 209 and 210 of this article have been complied with, (and if, in the judgment of such public officer such booth is otherwise constructed in a manner so as to render safe the operation of apparatus for projecting moving pictures) such public officer shall issue to the owner or lessee of the premises wherein such booth is situated a certificate stating that the provisions of Section 209 and 210 of this article (shall) have been complied with.

Section 213. Portable booth for temporary exhibitions. Where motion pictures are exhibited daily for not more than one month, or not oftener than three times a week, in educational or religious institutions or bona fide social, scientific, political, or athletic clubs a portable booth may be substituted for the booth required in Sections 209 and 210 of this article. Such booth shall have a height of not less than six feet and an area of not less than twenty square feet, and shall be constructed of asbestos board, sheet steel of not less gauge than twenty-four, or some other approved fireproof material. Said portable booth shall conform to the specifications of Section 210 of this article with reference to windows and door. Said portable booth shall be equipped with a fireproof vent-flue of not less than fifty square inches cross sectional area, which flue should communicate with the outer air and shall be kept continuously open. The floor of said booth shall be elevated above the permanent support on which it is placed by a space of at least one-half inch, sufficient to allow the passage of air between the floor of booth and the platform on which the booth rests, and the booth shall be insulated so that it will not conduct electricity to any other portion of the building.

Section 214. Exemptions and Requirements for Miniature Cinematograph Machines. The above sections, 209, 211, 212 and 213 referring to permanent and portable booths, shall not apply to any miniature motion picture machine in which the maximum electric current used for the light shall be 350 watts. Said miniature machine shall be operated in an approved box of approved fireproof material constructed with a fusible link or other approved releasing device to close instantaneously and completely in case of combustion within the box. The light in said miniature machine shall be completely enclosed in a metal lantern box covered with an unremovable roof.

Section 215. Inspection, Certificate for Portable Booths and Miniature Cinematograph Machines. Before moving pictures shall be exhibited with a portable booth, under Section 212 of the above article, and before a miniature machine without a booth shall be used as prescribed in Section 213 of this article, there shall be obtained from the appropriate authority as defined in Section 210 of this chapter, a certificate of approval.

Section 216. (Section 212). 1. Penalty for violating this article. The violation of any of the provisions of this article shall constitute a misdemeanor. This act shall not apply to cities which have local laws or ordinances now in force which provide for fireproof booths of any kind for moving picture machines or apparatus.

(Section 2). 2. This act shall take effect immediately.

PAUL V. RAINEY'S SOUTH AFRICAN LECTURE

Those people who were fortunate enough to be present at the Hotel Astor on Monday, Feb. 26th, at the Canadian Club dinner certainly had a treat and again at the American Museum of Natural History on Thursday, the 29th. As these pictures will be exhibited throughout the States we herewith reproduce Mr. Rainey's lecture and will say the only fault we had to find was in the personnel of the operators. They did not know their business, they scarcely knew how to frame up a picture, to manipulate the light, or to do away with the ghost. We trust that operators of experience will be provided by every institution where these pictures are exhibited in future. The pictures in themselves are splendid and great praise is due to John C. Hemment for the manner in which he took the pictures and to Paul V. Rainey in giving us such an admirable illustration of what South Africa has to show us in the way of nature. As educational pictures these will stand par excellence and will be handed down, we hope, to future generations, and further that the Modern Historic Records Association will receive a copy of these films for their archives. Here followeth the lecture as delivered by Mr. Rainey.

I am not going to bore you with any long maps or long talks on Africa, as there has been so much written on the subject since our ex-President went out there.

It is about 6,000 miles long and about 4,000 miles in width. I do not know much more I could say than that it is one of the most beautiful countries I have secn in my life. It was indeed a great surprise as I think you will see from the pictures.

(First Film)

This is the safari leaving Nairobi. See the men checking them out; the different head-dress they have, and the different customs. These are known as the Askairi, on police duty; they look after the saifari. In this trip we are about to go on I had something like 250 porters. We paid the Askairis five rupees and the porters two rupees per month, which is about $1.30 per month. This is one of the Somali gun bearers—Juma. We took him on the trip and he was also with Colonel Roosevelt. They are all lined up now and ready to start. They love to blow horns and make a loud noise when they start. (Laughter.) There are mostly Swahellies; they carry about 60 lbs. This is on the way to the desert. Here you see Mt. Kenia in the distance, 17,968 ft. high and over 90 miles in the distance. Though almost under the equator the peak is always snowbound. These are thc cages I had and are pretty big. These cages hold about 60 lbs. The natives are mixed, being composed of Wahkamba, Swahellies and Kavandas, and carry a 60 lb. load, practically the only thing they are good for, from morning till night, and do from ten to twenty miles. This is the Askairi, the only one allowed to carry a gun. He has permit from the governmcnt. Instead of saying they are going on a long trip they say they are on a safari. Each load is carefully weighed and is about 60 pounds. This last one here is my head man, General Yumamaleaih. These are the Kikuyus. We picked up about sixty of them to carry some extra load. You will notice the different way they carry their loads on their backs instead of on their heads like the others. This is a very good type of Somali. This is Allen Black, a well known white hunter, and the dogs that went with him on the trip; Dr. Johnson and myself. This is inspanning oxen. We had about fifty oxen to each trip. I think if there is anything belongs in heaven it is thesc oxen, because they are so knocked about, and they lost half of them before we got back from the trip. A man always goes in front, generally a boy, and leads the league team. This picture has been tinted as you see. It was taken in the dry season so the grass does not show really as bright and green as it should be. This gives you a very good idea of the general country around Kedong Valley on the way to Southern Guasenyro. They can crack that whip louder than a shot gun. (Great applause as the teams and safari wind their way through the grass, down the gully and through Grant's Glade.) This is loading the camels for our trip through the desert and the Iseola River. I intended to go through Abyssinia into Marsebet, cross the River Nile and then return, but was unable to get enough camels on account of the government reserving them for their transportation. This is entering the Guascnyro River as you will see a little later on. I believe a camel can outkick anything in the world; they have a universal joint and they can kick in any direction. This is the camel safari crossing the Guasenyro River and arriving at our base of supplies—Archer's Post, as you will see by the boys who are here now. These are the Somali boys and Somali horses. One of the great dangers in crossing the rivers of Africa is on account of the crocodile. This river, however, is very shallow and we did not have much trouble at this place.

We had a very hot march and these boys are bathing in the river. Thcre are the Kikuyus. We are throwing coins in the water for them. (Laughter.) They are feeling on the bottom of the sand for the coins. This is taken just as we were leaving for the desert, some eighty miles to the next water. The next picture I show, of the animals at the water hole, is practically at the end of this trip. Most of the white people of Africa are confirmed tea drinkers. The Somali boys come from the borders of Abyssinia. These ponies you see were also bought in Abyssinia. These are some sheep we took along part of the way to feed on.

Few people realize how valuable these cinematograph pictures are in portraying wild game and wild life. The taxidermist mounts an animal and you go up to the museum and see him. It is certainly interesting and you get an idea of how the animal looks, but you have no idea of the characteristics or habits of the animals. People look at it and say very good, but, with the motion picture you get just the way the animals have of drinking—the way the elephant drinks, the giraffe, and it gives you a better idea and makes a record that last forever, and I believe two or three hundred years from now, after the game is gone, people will be able to see the animals gather at these watering holes in the deserts just as I saw them when these pictures were taken.

As I started to say before, when I first started out to Africa I imagined it was a desolate, dry, hot country full of diseases and everything else. They certainly do have a great many different kinds of disease—fever, liver, etc. In Nairobi, which is a fine flourishing city, there are 6,400 Indians. They have two rainy seasons in the year. After these rainy seasons the country is really beautiful, like an enormous park. You will see the acacia trees, oaks, etc., and then you see the game all over. It is one of the most beautiful countries I have ever seen. There are a number of English people there, and where the English are there is generally some kind of sport. They play polo and have five or six teams. They hunt the jackal, and so you can see it is quite a sporting community.

(Second Film)

This picture is catching wild ostriches. These are crocodiles on the banks of Tana. They are very dangerous. I have seen them attacking our dogs down to the river. We drove an old pair of ostriches and their young for three or four miles. Here we are catching the little one. They become tame, very soon—in three or four months you see them following the boys. Ostrich farming is the only industry that has made any money so far. It is wonderful how these little ones can hide. We had the camera concealed here and we drove the ostriches for miles. Here are the little ones we are catching. There is a little one, you can hardly see him. These are about a week old.

This is a month or three weeks later. You can see them following the boys who feed and attend them. They grow very rapidly—it is marvelous how they grow. They are perfectly tame for just following the ostrich boys. These are ostriches about a year old. This running around is what they call dancing. They probably do it more before mating than at any other time. It was at this place that I was unable to get in the reserve, but a lion came in and killed fifty ostriches in one night, and after that I had no trouble in getting in, about which I will tell you later. When these ostriches get another year old they get very dangerous. They can strike a terrific blow. The way to get the best of them is to have a brush with thorns in the end and jab them in the neck. The last one that comes out is the old cock and he is very savage.

This shows you the way we get animals for the zoo. Of course we had a trap. We got the wild dog this way—the second one that ever came to America. It is in the Zoo now. They are hanging the bait in the tree. It is a good thing that you do not get the odor of that bait. (Question.) What is it? It is a buck or young orrix. Any small animal or meat put in a tree will do. This man digging a hole is to put the trap in. We always cover the trap over with earth. This is a striped hyena in the trap. This animal has the heaviest jaw of anything in Africa. They are known to break the leg of a zebra in one bite. They are cowards and simply scavengers—they do not kill at all. Now they are bringing the cage. This trap does not hurt the leg at all as it is padded. It is very heavy. In fact, it does not wear the hair off, as you will see. Of course, it is not very comfortable and I do not mean to say it is very pleasant. (Applause as the hyena is deftly covered over with the cage and the trap door is sprung.) Then the cage is lifted up by the natives on their shoulders. Now starts his 10,000 mile journey to New York.

This next picture I am going to show you is the water hole in the desert. It is what I call a "Noah's Ark" because of so many different animals which come to this spot. These watering holes are the most wonderful places at which to study wild life. The zebra, stein buck, the dik-dik, impala, orrix, elephants, and different animals come here to feed. You will notice the small buck, how frightened they are because it is here that the lions catch them. Here is seen the sand grouse. You will see thousands of sand grouse come for water. You will see flocks of them. With ten or fifteen shots I killed fifty just flying over my head. I have endeavored with these pictures, as near as I could, to avoid what they call nature faking, and the only thing I have done at all with these pictures is at the beginning of the lion hunt, where Masai chiefs came in and report "Zimba," which means lion. This was posed, and this is the only thing in all the pictures that was posed. It is really as it happened to us and just as these boys told us they had seen a lion where we get a start.

These are some of the zebra feeding on the plain. This is a water-buck and he is not wounded or touched in any way. This is the water hole in the desert. Here you see the rhino, the baboon and the impala. Notice how frightened the impala is in entering. This is a little hole in the sand where the animals have dug down for four or five feet and then get water. In ages gone by there has been water there. There is no water within sixty miles of this place. These vultures were on the wing before we could get their pictures. This is the orrix, and the other the impala. (Loud applause.) If I do say it myself, you never will get a chance to see wild life unless you actually go there and see it as I did. Here comes the rhino. There are five. This is a grevy-eyed zebra, much larger than the ordinary zebra. They are fighting for the water. They have to clean out the sand to get at the water. (From the audience): "That is a wonderful picture, Rainey." (Unanimous applause.)

Now you see the sand grouse. (Question.) "How far away was the camera?" About twenty yards. Several times we found one of the animals would be attracted by the turning of the machine, but kept right on and then they seemed to lose interest in it. The rhinos were more dangerous than the elephants. That rhino you will notice has an immense horn. It is a great temptation to shoot some of them but if we did it always spoiled the water holes, as they would not come back. Now you will see how the giraffe straddles out to drink. Some people say they kneel, but you will notice how they really drink. He gets suspicious. This is the reticulated giraffe, only found up on the desert or the Abyssinia border. He is rather rare. Now you see him drink. (Applause.)

You will see when the zebra goes near the giraffe and he makes a little movement with his leg how quickly the zebra gets away. One of the most awful blows that can be struck is by a giraffe. This is the orrix—the one with the long horn. (End of film—unanimous applause.)

The next picture I am going to show you is of the elephant, and so near as I can find out from the best authority, it is the only motion picture taken of an elephant in its native haunts. In fact this is the only country where a motion picture can be taken of wild animal life. I must say elephant hunting is about the poorest sport I ever participated in. I do not think any one would hunt an elephant if it was not for the ivory. One thing happened to us. In the middle of the day the heat was something terrific, in fact, we stayed in our tents from nine in the morning until five in the afternoon with very little clothes on. The heat and flies would make you very nervous and drive you crazy. However, we decided to start out after an elephant. We had been tracking these elephants all night long and until about ten o'clock in the morning and were about all in. We had tracked them up a clearing where we stopped for refreshments. Black went in front, I was next and Dr. Johnson was behind me. The trail led into some acacia trees and in very heavy brush. I suddenly happened to look up and we were standing almost under three large cows. We had backed off the trail and at the same instant Black saw them up went his gun and I did the same. They were cows and Black said: "For heaven's sake get out of here, but don't shoot," and we started down the trail. I started across and beat him about ten yards out into the open. When we came out into the open very pale and badly frightened he nudged me and says, "You made an awful noise over there," to which I replied: "I heard some noise over in your 'alley' too, and if there is anything doing I am going to stay right out in front, and not take any back water from anybody." I wanted to get one elephant on my trip, and it turned out to be a cow, but, the government allows you to kill anything with tusks on, over thirty pounds, as it is then the same as a bull, and this one weighed very nearly eighty pounds.

(Fourth Film)

Here are the vultures that you see all over Africa. It is against the law to kill them. Anything dies and in half an hour the vultures are circulating around, whether they see or smell nobody knows, but here you see how they get there.

Here are the elephants feeding. They feed on little twigs and branches of tree. These are the cows. Now the tusks on that cow probably would not weigh over twenty-five or thirty pounds apiece. Here you see little dik-diks, one of the smallest bucks in the world; about the size of a good-sized hare. Now you see the elephant, the old cow, and the little calf to-to as they are called, and a three-year-old calf. The old cow is cleaning out the hole and the little baby is interfering all the time. She has to keep putting him away. You see the wonderful charge she makes at this other when she tries to interfere with the baby drinking. The water is a sort of catch basin underneath and the holes are simply made by the game. (Laughter.) As the moving picture shows the elephant scratching his tail on a hugh rock. See how frightened this buck is—the look-out that he keeps. This is the way all these game approach a watering hole, especially when they are alone. That is the impala, a very beautiful buck about the size of our deer. This is a rhino taken on the plain. He afterwards goes to the water. This gives you a very good idea of the way they walk, move about and act. The moving picture operator followed him across the plains one morning to the watering hole for about three hours, just about this distance as you will notice, keeping up with him all the time. You will notice the rhino birds on his back. They live on the rhino ticks. When any danger approaches they fly up and although the rhino may be asleep he instantly rises up. They give warning. Now he is rolling himself in the mud. (Question from the audience.) How far away were these rhinos? About twenty or thirty yards, he is about forty yards now. Very close now. The rhino birds are now on his back, watch carefully and you will see them. There is one, there they are. He becomes suspicious here. He is thinking about charging. (Question.) Does he hear the machine? Yes, he did and we kept it going right along and he did not seem to pay any attention to it. (End of film—applause.)

The next picture I am going to show here is of the lion. Friends of mine who have been to Africa and come back have told me of hearing the lions at night, hearing them roar, seeing the spoor next morning, and everything, but, they were unable to see the lion in the daytime. I thought it would be a strange thing if I could not take my dogs and pick up the trail where the lion had been during the night, and the next day trail him and kill him. On the way out I had a fight pretty near every night in the smoking room on the boat going to Mombasa. The men asked me how many curs I thought I would have left after the first lion hunt. I just said wait and you will see. I found out the difficulty was to trail the lions and to get my hounds to run the trail and fight the lion in ambush and shoot if he pursued him. So I got some young lion cubs and ran them across the country and let the dogs on their trail so that they got to know what the lion spoor was and to scent them.

In six weeks I killed about twenty-six lions, and when I came back to Nairobi some of the men would not speak to me. Some of them said I was not to go back into the country again. This made me rather angry and I went to Oustnam, the game ranger, and told him that I did not have to hunt lions in or around Nairobi or any other place in Africa, and that there were plenty of places in America where I could hunt bear. He said, you do not need to go back. Some of the farmers had a meeting and they said if you do not let this man go in we are going in ourselves, so the warden, to kill two birds with one stone, allowed me to go in. I killed fifty lions. We broke all records of the world. Altogether we killed ninety-four; sixteen in one day. This is where we killed nine in thirty-five minutes, one morning on the 25th of May.

Another thing my hounds became very valuable in was not only in tracking the trail, running the lion and jumping him, but also as fighters. I would go and just allow my hounds to range through the reserves, nothing could escape them.

Very few people who go to Africa ever see leopards. The leopards feed on the dogs coming into the towns. I was told to wait until the leopards got ahold of my hounds and see what happened. Well to make the story short we got the scent of a leopard and one of my hounds ran up to the thing and barked and the rest of the dogs followed. A big leopard jumped out and away went the whole pack. Immediately after I could hear the leopard growling and the dogs biting. To be honest with you I was afraid to go after him. Finally, however, Mr. Heller came up and we found that the hounds had killed him.

On the next leopard I made up my mind to see what happened. And what happens was that the leopard lays down on his back and tries to hug the dog with his fore paws and after just simply two or three good bites it seems to almost paralyze him.

The best picture I ever made of a charging lion was one that we lost. We had a wounded lion on the plains about thirty-one yards from the camera. Hemment started to photograph her. She sat up on her hind legs and he said we were not getting enough action and suggested that we throw some stones at her. The boys threw the stones and we got the action all right. She watched the stones roll past her and then she started after us. Unfortunately I had only my light gun. I shot her square in the chest but I never knew I had hit her. She swished off straight for the machine, and Black who was right behind me let go his "470" and knocked her down. The man Hemment, who took the pictures, I will say turned the crank and stuck to his camera until the lion came out of focus and dropped dead, only forty inches from the camera. These pictures should be developed within a certain length of time and we sent them to America to be done and by the time they reached New York they were spoiled, having been too long on the voyage on account of the big dock strike and suffered sweating.

(Fifth Film)

On my trip in Africa I never had but two dogs killed outright by a lion. I had one dog killed with almost every bone in his body broken by a blow. I was running two or three dogs but you want a large pack when they are on the run. Another time I had a dog crippled on the plain so that he died. What happens to the lion? They are the biggest scavengers in Africa. No matter how long a thing has been dead they will eat it, and anything which he touches with his claws it is almost sure death. Some of the dogs would have very slight scratches and we treated them carefully, but do what we could they would most always die.

This is the cheetah and when we came up to them they had this cheetah standing up in the tree and you will see the dog behind her. She turns around and sees us and springs right out of the tree. We get the camera going again and the next time she jumps out you will see they kill her right in front of the camera.

This is a little baby baboon which went all over Africa with me. It was a wonderful pet and would ride on the oxen. These are my hounds around camp and the fighting dog. The baboon had her particular pet that she would play with, and out of the forty dogs she knew them all, and I must say that I was the only one that this monkey would not bite. When I first got her I gave her a good whipping and after that she would bite anyone but me, and that is the reason I kept her.

Now comes the two Maisie boys to tell us that they have seen a lion. It happened to us just this way on several different occasions. Now we get up the lion hunt. These horses are Abyssinian ponies. Unfortunately they die from a great many different diseases—from the tetsie fly and the reuzda pest. These are the Southern type of fox hound and the fighting dogs. They are very hard to train. Now we are putting them on the trail. Here they go. Now you see the men behind catching up with the fighting dogs, you see them passing. The lion is in the brush. Now you see the dogs fighting him. One time I came very near shooting him. With one spring he could have been right on us. This picture was taken within about fifteen yards. Now he breaks. Now they have him bayed up in another place. You will see him come right out now and make through here. All of these dogs have been scratched from one time or another and know how to take care of themselves. That light bitch over there had a bad scratch one time and she never got another. He has been shot right under the jaw now, the shot going a little too low. The dogs know that he has been shot and they give it to him pretty good and plenty. About this time he is shot again, and the dogs end him.

There you see the cheetah standing right on top of the tree and you see the dogs climbing up behind the cheetah. You see them climb up higher. Off he jumps from the top of the tree to the ground and now they are killing him in front of the camera. They kill him by themselves. I always let them worry anything like a cheetah to encourage them. This is one great dog here, called Dewey, brought from Mississippi.

This is my picture of Silver King, a large bear now at the Zoo. You can hardly see the railing of the boat as he is being pulled up by the derrick. I think it is the greatest picture ever taken of any animal. (Applause.)

(Great applause as Mr. Rainey's picture is flashed on the screen.)

"CARMEN" AND "CRY OF THE CHILDREN" BY THANHOUSER

The "Thanhouser Classic" of "Carmen" is promised the Independent theatres soon. The subject was held back to allow "Nicholas Nickleby" to jump in during the Dickens' Anniversary excitement and get the new Florida series moving. "Carmen" is in two reels, and some special advertising matter is being prepared for it.

While the whole country is discussing the Lawrence strike and the removal or "kidnapping" of the strikers' children, Thanhouser announces a timely feature in "The Cry of the Children," after the poem by Elizabeth Barrett Browning. As a child-labor subject, the producers feel they have gotten together something that will live through the ages and work benefit through the ages. It is released Tuesday, April 30th, in two reels. It is in Thanhouser's "Can Such Things Be?" series and with a strong line of paper will help put the picture show under the New York World's definition of "civilizer."

Jackson, Mich.—Col. W. S. Butterfield, of Battle Creek, owner of a string of vaudeville theatres, will erect a new playhouse at East Pearl and West Main streets.

Kansas City, Mo.—The Swofford Realty Company will erect a new theatre at Thirteenth and McGee streets, at a cost of $71,000.

AMERICAN SECURES REMARKABLE LENS FOR CAMERA WORK

The new studio of the American Film Mfg. Co. is rapidly nearing completion. It promises one of the really fine studios of the country where the productions of any magnitude may be staged. It is the last part of the American's new factory, located at North Edgewater, Chicago, to be completed.

In every case, the latest and most improved devices were used. Contrary to custom the studios have been made in triangular shape, the camera man to occupy the niche where both side walls meet. Roof and sides are covered with a special glass whose diffused rays are expected to add considerably to the photographic results.

Probably the most interesting feature of the new studio is a new lens, never before used in any sort of photographic work, which has developed the astonishing speed of F 1.9, in optical terms, which is several times faster than the most optimistic ever dreamed of. Among those manufacturers anxious to secure the best results the lens now in use is considered the fastest in the world. This operates at a speed of F 3.5. Hence, it will be seen that the American's new lens will be a distinct novelty.

In experimental work the new lens was used with gratifying results at 5:30 p. m. in the evening of a February day. The pictures were sharp, brilliant and in every way most satistactory. No special lighting devices will be required in the American's new studio if this new lens lives up to its present record.

Ambridge, Pa.—Col. T. J. Keenan is having plans prepared for a new theatre to be erected here.

New York, N. Y.—Herbert R. Brewster, of Manhattan, has the contract for the erection of a new $200,000 theatre to be erected here. Seating capacity 1,500.

Richmond, Ind.—Murray Theatre Company; capital $10,000; O. G. Murray, O. M. Murray and A. E. Urban.

Lakeview, Ore.—C. U. Snider will erect a new opera house here.

WILL PHOTOGRAPH MOON FROM DAYTON

Moving Picture Is Being Taken Through Largest Telescope

By M. A. Neff

The light of the motion picture camera has advanced the world hundreds of years. Ignorance and superstition vanish before the motion picture camera as the dew before the morning sun. Cinematography to-day encircles the world, bringing joy into the hearts and educating millions, and yet its great force and educational power is appreciated and understood only by a limited few. Those who are condemning, like the ignorant a century ago, believe in witchcraft and have even burned witches at the stake.

Cinematography, the real reliable educator, is a great truthful exemplifier. Motion photography cannot lie. A photograph tells the story accurately, thoroughly and truthfully. While the historian may err or be misinformed, the camera tells and depicts things just as they are.

Will Photograph the Moon

In Dayton, where the next big convention is to be held March 26 and 27, the process of photographing the moon is now being conducted and it is not impossible, by any means, that the motion picture photography will depict in the near future the real moon that has been guessed at and looked at for thousands of years.

If astronomers and scientists will turn to cinematography the world will soon reap great benefit. I am pleased to note that in Dayton there is one of the most powerful telescopes in the world and through its force, combined with cinematography, that the world will reap a rich harvest of benefits. The growth of the industry the world over makes it onc of the most marvelous institutions in history.

London, England, at the present time has over 350 moving picture theatres. In the empire there are over 3,000. In 1895 there was one. In 1896 there were twenty-eight. In London the price ranges from 4 cents to 61 cents admission. The show lasts for an hour and a half to an hour and three-quarters. In Bradford the price ranges from 4 cents to 36 cents.

Sixty per cent of the pictures shown in England are manufactured in America. In 1907 there were only four picture shows in Glasgow, Scotland. Now Glasgow boasts of over 100. Every town in Scotland of 4,000 population has one or more picture shows.

Germany boasts of over 2,500 moving picture shows in the empire, over 300 being in Berlin. There are sixty or more of what we would call in this country film companies in the empire.

A motion picture operator in Berlin is paid from 30 to 40 marks a week. In United States money this would be $7.14 to $9.52. Operators in the smaller cities receive 20 to 30 marks per week, which would be, in United States money, $4.76 to $7.14.

Russians Like American Pictures

In Norway there are twenty moving picture shows in Christiania and nine in Bergen. All the machines are French make. Films from various countries are used in Russia. There are a few theatres where one can get a seat for 8 cents and they are patronized only by the poorer class. The admission to the better picture shows is from 20 cents to 25 cents. French pictures in Moscow seem to be the more popular, and American picture manufactures are well received. Indian pictures seem to take best in Russia.

Barcelona, Spain, has seventy picture shows and the number is increasing. There is a manufactory of machines which has 550 in use throughout Spain. The film output is very small. In Turkey, American films are most popular. Morocco is a very promising field for the motion picture. The natives quickly take to the pictures. There is only one picture theatre in Tangier, and it is reaping a harvest. There are three picture shows in Beirut, Syria, one each in Damascus, Haifa and Tripoli. At Aleppo there is but one picture show in the district.

In Yokohama the picture shows are taking the place of the old line of theatres. The price of admission is sometimes 2½ cents, but usually 5 cents. There are a large number of traveling picture shows. In Shanghai American pictures are in great favor. There are two motion picture machines in Herba, one English and the other French make.

In Singapore there are three moving picture shows. In Australia, Melbourne seems to have the moving theatre business monopolized. Johannesburg, South Africa, has sixteen moving picture theatres, splendidly built and well appointed. American films are very popular in South Africa, especially cowboy and Indian pictures.—Cleveland Leader.

IMPROVEMENT

Some critics have exhausted the English language in attempting to discover terms sufficiently vitriolic to describe their views of the present-day motion picture. The stories they tell are attacked. The acting is made the subject of much unjust writing and the photography comes in for a share in the disagreeable assertions which often make the patron of the pictures wonder where these critics keep their eyes.

The writer of this has seen some pictures in the past few years. He has composed and has had accepted a few scenarios. In instances the producers have commended these scenarios as being especially good. And he wants to state here in the most unmistakable terms that the improvement, as he sees it, has been constant and is now very marked. There has never been a time when the picture was as good as it is now.

Just at present there is a great deal said about the Wild West pictures which are common wherever the silent drama is shown. This writer has joined in this criticism in instances, and has, at times, deplored the long list of such plays that are being presented without point. But that does not alter the fact that the properly written, properly presented, Wild West picture is a transcript of life which cannot be otherwise than interesting. Perhaps those pictures which have distorted this life should be banished, but the others will always be good.

Further, the ultimate jury in all instances of this sort is the audience, and outside of the larger cities the Wild West show is still popular. Nor do the distortions which are often inseparably connected with it seem to make much difference. Few know the difference and the life and action are so strong that they look upon them with pleasure. Few theatres in the smaller towns and cities are so well patronized as those which show the Wild West films.

It is impossible, of course, to say how long this will last. But there is no diminution yet. The writer sat in a theatre in a small city the other night and saw a Wild West picture which was two months old, and in some scenes very closely approached an April shower. Yet the audience cheered it vociferously. A similar picture would have pleased quite as well as the one that followed, which was of a totally different character.

The picturesque qualities of the releases of the principal independent companies are improving daily. The Rex, for example. The writer saw one the past week which was photographically a gem. The work was all done in a low key, with perfect gradation and the smallest detail plainly shown without resorting to the staring whites and the heavy blacks which have made pictures in the past disagreeable in some instances.

The same observation applies to an American seen in the same theatre. It was that one which tells the story of Broadway meeting the mountains. It would be hard to plan anything more picturesque than the setting of those scenes among the mountains, looking out over the valleys to the distant peaks beyond. The story was well told, but the striking feature, after all, was the scenic effects. Any story worked out in such magnificent scenery would be good.

Such photography is possible in all instances now. The beautiful gradation which makes pictures artistic can be obtained by any one with the exertion of a little care. Subsequent mechanical operations should make the picture good if the negative is properly made. And here there has been improvement continuously. Critics might well turn their attention to pointing out how pictures might be improved. If they would write a few scenarios they might discover that there are limitations which cannot be overcome, but which should not subject the picture to vitriolic criticism. Influence the producers to make good pictures, but offer a word of commendation occasionally when they do turn out something worth while.

OUR WESTERN CORRESPONDENT

Hot Springs, Ark., March 7.

Well, we have "gone done and did" it! Let managers of moving picture houses sit up and take notice and look for the release of pictures of this city, for they will be put on the market, and, to ye of the trade, let me say that when you see them you will be looking at views of the greatest health resort in the world and at some of the horses entered in the biggest horse show the South has ever seen.

It took several months to conclude negotiations between the Business Men's League, as represented by Secretary George R. Belding, and the Chicago Motion Picture Company, represented by Mr. Rothaker, but all things have an ending, so, too, have negotiations of this nature, and the result was that Mr. Rothaker "came, saw and conquered."

A few days before the pictures were taken, the newspapers made announcement of the fact that the man with the moving picture camera would pass along Central avenue, taking views of "Bath House Row," where are situated all the principal bathhouses of the city, asking that as many as could possibly crowd on the avenue be on hand, as the man turning the crank desired to include everyone in the picture. The newspapers were responsible for the great outpouring of patriotic souls, who came attired in their best regalia, so that the pictures show society, visiting and local, to the best advantage. The crowd at the Horse Show was also "filmed," and the man with the camera passed by the private box of Andrew Carnegie, who, accompanied by his family, arrived for this great social and equine event, and also stopped to get a view of Frank J. Gould and his wife and party.

You see, ladies and gentlemen, we had some swell mob there, and after the occupants in the boxes and grandstand had been taken care of, the camera man turned his attention to the tanbark arena, where he took views of some of the finest horseflesh in the country. For instance, "Honor Boy" and Honor Bright," one of the best pairs in the United States, were in the ring at the time. These horses are owned by Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Walsh, Jr., of St. Louis. After them came "The King," the champion of the world in his class, with his mistress, Miss Lulu Long, daughter of the millionaire lumberman, R. A. Long, of Kansas City, driving. Then, too, there was "Royal Regent," another world's champion, the property of Mr. and Mrs. D. J. Mooers, of Columbia, Mo., together with the leading blue ribbon winners, all of whom are now part of the Hot Springs picture. But even that was not all. Out on the golf links at the Country Club views were also taken, and from there Mr. Rothaker went to the mountain driveways, where many of the exhibitors at the Horse Show also took some of their fine equipages and, as a special favor, drove past the camera.

These picture are to form the principal features of a genuine plot written around Hot Springs. The first scene will be that of the home of a very sick man, who is finally ordered to this city by his family physician. His wife has a very wealthy "friend" of the masculine gender, who is most attentive to her. We see the invalid depart for Hot Springs, his arrival here is noted, together with the hotel where he will stop; likewise he is seen taking the baths. His improved condition is "filmed," and we meet him walking on the avenue, out at the Horse Show, horseback riding on the mountain, and finally, cured and happy from rheumatism, we note his departure. He arrives home to learn that his wife's friend hasn't wasted any time during his absence, so there's only one thing to demonstrate that sometimes they do "come back," and he proceeds to pitch the "friend" through the nearest window. The pictures are not made in the hope that other invalid or doubting husbands may also take the same method of ridding themselves of excess baggage, but to illustrate the great benefit the baths give to all, and the human interest features were put in to take the pictures out of the commercial field and enhance their value.

Patrons of the Photo Play Theatre the past week had an opportunity of paying the second visit to Hell within the past few months, when another version of Dante's Inferno" was thrown on the screen. The management of this house tells me that a Mr. Abbey arranged with him for these pictures and from what the Photo Play chief says, it looks as if Mr. Abbey deserves to go to the head of the class organized for "smooth propositions."

To begin with, the pictures were supposed to be the original ones that were here a few days ago. So far as nudity goes, those were bad enough. We had our living pictures all right that time, but, Gee Whiz! these were ten times worse, and they were not the original ones by a long shot. They were not nearly as good as the former reels, yet the contract that Mr. Abbey drew up was so binding that the Photo Play management had no chance to break it. Miss Rose Ivy, she of vaudeville fame and several hundred pounds overweight, tore off several selections, mingling "If I Were a Butterfly" with the "Holy City," and gave an ineeresting discourse on "Dante," as well as explaining the pictures. The Photo Play people have "The Crusaders" as their next big feature, as well as several others, but they are not tickled to death over the wide-awake Mr. Abbey.

For the past five weeks Eddie Gavrel has been away, and rumor has it that when the popular manager of the Lyceum returns that he will come back with his blushing bride. I think I shall devote the "lead" in my next letter to an interview with Eddie on how it feels to be married.

* * * *

The New Central Theatre put over a great feature this week when the pictures of the "Raising of the Battleship Maine" were here for the first time. The house was tastefully decorated in the colors of the Horse Show, crimson and white, in honor of that equine exposition, as well as in the Red, White and Blue as a tribute to Uncle Sam, and the reels were much enjoyed. The orchestra mapped out a special program and got away with it in great shape. These pictures are the ones sanctioned by the United States Government and they made a great hit.

There is one reel I saw the past week that should never have been produced. It was a foreign film, and depicted "The Strangler" most vividly. It showed a visit to an insane asylum, the escape of one of the dangerous inmates, how he chased a woman all over the grounds and finally caught her and was strangling her to death when rescued. Women cried out in terror when that reel was thrown on the screen. It was a rotten piece of work if it tended to show what motion pictures were. The acting was immense, and this adverse criticism is not fired at the individual members of the company, but to the man who permitted a scenario of that kind to be produced. It resorted to the worst features possible and was a disgrace to the trade.

And now, Mr. Manager, if you see the Hot Springs pictures advertised, book 'em. They are no more like the Imp's half reel than day is like night. These are real pictures. If you have never seen Hot Springs, these pictures will tell you the story.

THE MAN IN THE BATHS.

LOS ANGELES CORRESPONDENT

Moving pictures are now being used in two churches in Los Angeles and they will soon be installed in all the public schools. In fact nearly every educational institution in the city is thinking favorably of the films.

One of the most important factors in the work of showing the people the value of the educational picture has been the Kinemacolor Company. Their new theatre, which was opened here a few months ago and which at that time was comparatively unknown, now has one of the largest lists of steady patrons of any house in the city.

Every week the various newspapers that were formerly prejudiced against moving pictures now comment on the films that are exhibited at the Kinemacolor Theatre.

Several days ago almost the entire editorial page of the Los Angeles Record, which is one of the leading dailies, was devoted to Kinemacolor and pointed out the excellent subjects that are put on in natural colors.

The "Record" said in part, "When turbulent Teddy makes a statement the United States says: 'Amen.' A few months ago Teddy announced that the eighth wonder of the world was discovered, and that it was the kinemacolor pictures."

If you have visited the Kinemacolor Theatre you will no doubt endorse Teddy's verdict. These motion pictures photographed in nature's own colors not only are a wonderful factor in education, but are a delight to the mind and eye of any man or woman with a particle of artistic appreciation in the soul. In fidelity to nature, in elusive beauty of tint, in delicacy and brilliance of color these pictures are exceeded only by nature in her native haunts.

Although the kinemacolor process is but two years old, the English syndicate owning it now has over two million dollars invested in the industry and its men are scouring the uttermost parts of the earth to secure views. Among the pictures shown in Los Angeles recently were some views of the Canary Islands, among them one of the cave dwellers of Italia, a part of the islands. The existence of such a people is unsuspected by a large part of the world, yet the kinemacolor people hunted them out and the screen showed faithfully to the audience the conditions of their life.

To visit a beautiful art gallery is beyond the means of thousands of people who are hungry for beauty, but here is beauty, bewildering and abundant, brought to your very door, and at a price within reach of the poorest. It's a great world.

This is only one of the many articles that apper in the papers and the people are beginning to realize the big educational value in these films.

So if you believe in giving credit where credit is due the answer is kinemacolor.

RESOLUTION ADOPTED AT A MEETING OF THE INVENTORS' GUILD, HELD AT NEW YORK CITY, NOVEMBER 24, 1911

To the Honorable William H. Taft, President of the United States:

WHEREAS: The Constitution of the United States provides: "The Congress shall have power to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times, to inventors, the exclusive right to their respective discoveries."

AND, WHEREAS: This Constitutional provision was intended to obtain for the benefit of the Nation the publication of every new and useful invention in such full, clear, concise, and exact terms as to enable any person skilled in the art or science to which it pertains to make, construct, compound or use the invention, after the limited time for which the exclusive right is secured to the inventor by patent; and thereby to secure for the Nation the great benefit which, all experience shows, results to a Nation from publishing inventions, in contradistinction to following a policy which would tend to encourage trade secrets, monopoly, and trade combinations, which minimize the value of inventions to the Nation;

AND, WHEREAS: A patent is in effect a contract between the Government and the inventor by which the Government, in consideration of the right to publish the invention for the benefit of the Nation, agrees that in return for his satisfactory disclosures of his new and useful invention under reasonable conditions, to be determined by the Government, it will secure the inventor for a limited time in the exclusive right to his new and useful invention.

AND, WHEREAS: An inventor, after having performed his part of the contract by having made proper disclosure of a new and useful invention to the United States Government officials, is frequently subjected to unreasonable delay, expense, and injustice before obtaining his patent, and after having obtained his patent is not equitably secured in his exclusive right as the Constitution intended that he should be secured in return for his disclosure in good faith of his new and useful invention; and as a consequence of this unfair treatment of inventor patentees, the United States is not obtaining, in the degree that it should, the National benefit of the best inventive work of its many able inventors.

AND, WHEREAS: The United States Patent System has been evolved to its present condition without proper consideration of the rights of the Nation, and of the inventors, who are the two real parties at interest, but on the contrary has been developed to its present condition almost entirely as the result of suggestion from persons who do not occupy the position of one of the parties to the contract which every patent represents; and who do not suffer damage from the delays, complications, injustice and expense characteristic of the United States Patent System and the United States Courts which hear patent causes; said damage being borne principally but indirectly by the Nation and to a lesser degree, but indirectly, by the inventor-patentees.

AND, WHEREAS: It is a well-known fact that modern trade combinations tend strongly toward constancy of processes and products, and by their very nature are opposed to new processes and new products originated by independent inventors, and hence tend to restrain competition in the development and sale of patents and patent rights; and consequently tend to discourage independent inventive thought, to the great detriment of the Nation, and with injustice to inventors whom the Constitution especially intended to encourage and protect in their rights.

AND, WHEREAS: Under existing methods of trying patent causes, an inventor-patentee of average means could not, at his own expense, carry to a conclusion an average patent litigation against a wealthy opponent, and therefore a few wealthy concerns usually acquire nearly all important patents in their field, to the great damage of the Nation because of the restraint of competition and because of the resulting tendency of such inventors to seek protection for their inventions by trade secrets or else to cease inventive work.

AND, WHEREAS: Efficient protection by patent of new and useful inventions would offer to the average American Manufacturer one of the best methods of meeting foreign competition and would, in addition, improve quality, reduce first cost, and stimulate fair competition, with resulting benefit to the entire Nation.

RESOLVED: The inventors Guild, composed exclusively of independent and experienced inventor-patentees, does hereby respectfully ask the attention of the President of the United States to the urgent need of reforms in the Patent office, and also in the Courts which hear and decide Patent causes; and hereby requests the President to recommend to Congress the advisability of appointing a Committee to confer with experienced and representative inventors with the object of promptly accomplishing such reforms as will result in more effectively carrying out the intention of the Constitution; and to supplement such recommendations by such executive action as in his judgment seems likely to assist in accomplishing the needed reforms.

Respectfully submitted,
INVENTORS' GUILD,

Showing the splendid advertising and featuring of Bison films.

ELEVEN per cent of the inhabitants of this fair land of ours are cinematographic "fans." Just think of it! The moving picture audience is one of the most numerous things of the United States. No other amusement, no single occupation, can count so many followers as the moving pictures—with one exception, baseball.

The daily expenditure for this amusement is beginning to approach the total spent for bread, and so uniform and consistent is this outpouring of nickels and dimes that it is being reckoned with as one of the fixed expenses—almost one of the necessities—of life.

Think of what a force any project would have if it could enlist the moving picture audience. Governments could be swayed, Presidents made and unmade, destinies changed.

The moving picture show has supplanted the standard theatre in the hearts of the people and the amusement is becoming a formidable rival to that greatest of all pastimes—the ball diamond. As an innocent and economical entertainment, relished alike by the high and low, the rich and the poor, the moving picture theatre is supreme. Long may it wave!

Thus endeth the first chapter.

MAUD MULLER UP TO DATE

Maud Muller, on a summer's day,
Journeyed afar to the picture play

"I'm sick," said she, "of this hay field—
Just think, I'll see a Wild West reeled."

While viewing the picture she shouted "fraud"!
But what's the use—her name was Maud!

"Dinged if I'll vote for Wilson," asserted H. C. Higgins, proprietor of the Royal Theatre, at Sandusky, O. It seemeth the schoolmaster candidate for Presidency does not wish picture theatre advertising. He so advised Higgins. The first reply to several letters sent to Governor Wilson by Higgins came the other day and Wilson wrote that he did not care for "picture show advertising" and so would not enclose a photograph. "I might have voted for Wilson is too high and mighty for us people of common clay, after reading his letter, "but I'll be derned if I'll vote for him even if he gets the nomination. I have been a Democrat all my life."

President Taft and other public men are pleased to show courtesies to the moving picture industry. If Wilson is too high and mighty for we people of common clay, he should apply again for a Carnegie pension and retire.

INSANE QUERIES

"How do you ever find the time to go to a picture show?"

"Is King Baggott married?"

"How much money do they pay motion picture actors?"

"Do you like moving pictures?"

* * * *

We have just had a cable from Emperor William of Germany, who wishes to know the latest releases. All jokes aside, Wilhelm is a moving picture "fan." Dispatches from Berlin say that the Emperor causes all the new films showing current events or historical incidents to be shown to him, and he has his private picture machine and screen for that purpose.

"Such pictures really hold the mirror up to nature," Emperor William is quoted as saying. "They are more convincing than all the dispatches from my ambassadors, and more credible and reliable than telegrams and newspapers."

Verily, the moving picture is becoming real high toned. Here is good King George granting especial favors to Kinemacolor, President Taft signing the Statehood bill to the click of the moving picture camera, and the King of Italy taking war scenes for home consumption. All that now remains is for the Czar of Russia and the Colonel to come into the fold.

The Picture Play Philosopher blew into the office again this morning. He grabbed a bunch of copy paper and dashed off a little couplet. "I have called it 'Spring,' he said, as he placed the verse on our desk and hastily left. Here it is:

Gentle spring, oh, gentle spring,
Methinks I hear the robins sing.
Brightly shines the orb of day,
It's ME for the picture play!

And now we are going to have film dramas at "regular" theatre prices. Klaw & Erlanger, no longer able to remain out of a good thing, have embarked in the moving picture business. The action is significant. At last the worm has turned. The legitimate theatre, so-called, is no longer to submit supinely to the onward march of the moving picture drama. Noting the world-embracing sweep of cinematography, the stage has taken thought how best to compete with it and after all manner of comparisons, odious, invidious and otherwise, has about come to the conclusion that the reason for the expanding popularity of the picture houses must be the fact that the audience is freed from inane and superfluous conversation on the stage. It is believed that ere long a majority of the Big Guns of Stageland will be found active in the cinematographic field. Maybe Belasco will turn his attention to screen stagecraft. Perhaps it is not too much to imagine George M. Cohan doing the lead in a brisk Western two-reel with pretty cowgirls reeling along as a real background.

FAVORITE FICTION

"No, I never take less than fifty dollars for my scenarios."

"Yep; John Bunny and I went to school together. We are old pals."

"This is the most elaborate and costly film production ever presented in the United States."

"There is no doubt but that the moving picture is a great incentive to crime. Let us pray."

"Miss Goldie Formerly has tendered her resignation as a member of the Doorknob Film Company and is taking a much needed rest. She hopes to be ready to consider engagements after a brief sojourn in Europe."

Branding moving pictures of Indian life and romance as "faked" and untrue, M. Friedman, superintendent of the Carlisle Indian School, is busily engaged in urging Government censorship of such films. He declares the pictures an injustice to the noble Redman and harmful. Alleged delineations of cruelty by the "picture" Redskins are especially deplored by Superintendent Friedman. He says few real Indians are used to pose for the picture plays and that practically all are exaggerated. "The Indian is rapidly making his place in America as a good citizen and such pictures are insulting to him," says Friedman.

While it is true that in the past impossible characterizations of Indians have made ludicrous certain Western stories, there have been marked improvements in this regard in recent months. Mr. Friedman should take no exceptions to the historically correct film depicting those frontier days when the Sioux and Apache Indians roamed the plains, veritable incarnations of cruelty and deviltry. The savages of pioneer times are as much a chapter of our history as the Civil War. Exaggerated presentation of the present-day Indian is to be condemned. The depiction of the Indian of James Fenimore Cooper or of the time of Custer is another story altogether.

NOTES OF THE WEEK

NOTES OF THE WEEK

LIKE the waters of a great, muddy river flowing sparkling and clean from filter beds of gravel and fine sand, just so is the moving picture industry emerging from its purification of fire.

Everything that continues to be works toward some good end. Few, however, have questioned the intrinsic value of the thing itself, but many have been the attacks made upon the methods and subject matter used in the earlier stages of the industry.

That the cause of attack has been a just one we do not question. That all traces of the former causes of complaint are fast disappearing need not be unduly emphasized—the fact stands for itself.

That the public to-day are demanding only the cleanest and best of films, and that the majority stand for the educational as well as the entertaining, that the mothers and fathers of the masses are but too anxious to give their children the best they can at a price which fits their pockets, none who are well acquainted with the humanity of to-day will deny.

Everybody loves a picture, and that picture can just as well be good as bad. We love it all the better for its quality.

* * * *

Motion pictures are not used as much as they ought to be in public schools and institutions. A motion picture outfit wouldn't cost a very great amount of money to install in every grammar and high school, and once installed the cost of maintaining it would be insignificant.

The getting of proper subjects or films would be an easy matter, especially such subjects as pertain directly to our school work.

The works of almost every great author and poet are now portrayed in motion pictures. Every corner of the world is put before our eyes and we can see the scenery and study the habits, characteristics and manners of peoples of all other lands.

English, ancient and American history is shown with the minutest accuracy.

The lives of great dramatists, musicians, playwrights and tragedians are also put before our eyes.

Industries of every kind, both foreign and domestic, even the complete metamorphosis of useful, interesting and dangerous insects and microbes in microscopic forms, current events and almost everything known to mankind are shown by motion pictures.

On account of the severe censorship most of the films are clean, moral and would not offend even the most refined taste.

More could be taught by pictures in a very short amount of time than could be taught by our greatest professors and teachers in a much longer time.

We don't stop to consider the vast amount of money, time and talent used in making these pictures.

A subject rarely if ever costs less than several thousand dollars to produce and they sometimes run as high as $100,000, because the best actors obtainable are used to make them, and many very dangerous places are visited.—Harry Heiss in the Ware, Mass., News.

Captain F. E. Kleinschmidt, a young German sportsman, has arrived in New York after some months spent in photographing wild animals in Eastern Siberia and Alaska. He brings with him 10,000 feet of moving picture films which he and his companion, L. L. Lane, of San Francisco, made during the trip.

The lion D'Artagnan, the most ferocious animal in any French menagerie, is dead. He had mauled so many trainers that it was difficult to find anyone willing to enter his cage, so it was decided to shoot him; but he died gloriously in the open, in the beautiful forest of Fontainebleau.

D'Artagnan was sold to a cinematograph company, taken to the forest and set free. He was climbing a rock when he noticed a horse tied to a tree. While the animal trembled with terror the lion crept up and crouched for a spring. But at that moment a picturesque cowboy ran forward, raised his rifle, fired and the lion fell dead.

Says the Dayton, Ohio, Herald:

The municipal ownership and operation of a motion picture camera and films to serve the police department and to be used in advertising the city is a proposition Clem Kerr will lay before Chief Allaback and the Chamber of Commerce. Mr. Kerr declares that the film camera will better serve police needs in photographing criminals in that postures and physical characteristics can be secured. The negatives and films can be sent, he says, to the police departments of other cities.

The other use of the outfit, Mr. Kerr contends, can be to take pictures of conventions, views of the city, factories, public places and other places of interest, use them in films and have them displayed in other cities thereby advertising Dayton to an appreciable extent. He will suggest that the Chamber of Commerce aid in the promotion of the plan.

Mr. David Cohen, 68 Waverley street, Worcester, Mass., advocates the use of moving pictures in prisons as a factor in helping and reclaiming convicts. In speaking of this method, successfully used in the Colorado penitentiary, he says:

"The life size pictures, the swiftly changing scenes, the dumbly eloquent story, all pantomime, the actual portrayal of a lesson is flashed upon a canvas and holds the men spellbound.

"Such a picture is better than a sermon; better than a play in fact. It is a silent, powerful eloquent object lesson that holds their interest as though the scene in fact was being enacted then and there, and it remains imbedded in their minds, and furnishes them food for thought that perhaps nothing else would."

Washington, it seems, has finally been informed that there is a moving picture trust. Considering the fact that in the trade the expressions "Trust pictures" and "Independent pictures" are common and that everybody who has any knowledge of the matter at all is well aware of the condition, Washington is a trifle slow. But what difference does that make? The courts are still slower.

A new amusement enterprise, the American Associated Amusement Company, has been launched in Oklahoma City with a capital stock of $100,000.

According to the plans set forth by the promoters this concern hopes to be the Klaw & Erlanger of the motion picture business. Plans are already under way for a theatre with a seating capacity of 1,500 to be located in Oklahoma City and to be devoted exclusively to the "silent drama." In the building will be the general offices of the company and a stage with appliances for producing the efforts of local dramatists. It is planned to maintain a regular stock company that will present sketches written by local authors, so that Oklahomans will see familiar faces projected on the screens in their favorite theatres.

A successful demonstration of a newly invented non-inflammable moving picture machine was made recently in the room of the fire board at Newark, N. J., by the Edison Company. The machine is designed for home use, and besides being economical in cost is so compact as to make it both novel and highly interesting. The size of the picture on the films is 3-16 by 5-32 of an inch and run 216 to a foot. There are three rows of pictures on each film. The usual size of the pictures now used run 16 to a foot. Eighty feet of the new style films are equivalent to 1,000 feet of the regular films.

Projected on the screen the new pictures, though so tiny that they are almost invisible to the naked eye, will show a picture of 4 by 6 feet.

The light necessary to the operation of the machine is supplied either by the electric current in a home or by the use of acetylene gas.

The entire machine will weigh about 13 pounds.

The wife of Jan Kubelik, violinist, wept tears of joy when in a Columbia, Mo., moving picture theatre her husband surprised her with a life size moving picture of their five children from whom she has been absent five months. An ambitious young manager of one of the leading moving picture theatres in Norfolk, Va., has hit upon a novel idea for producing music by electricity which has greatly surprised and pleased the audiences.

The pianist and drummer start in to play "Dill Pickles" or some other lively selection and, having played it over once, they start in to play it again, when lo, they are joined by a third instrument, which is not in one particular place, but seems to be all over the house. As the quick notes of the piano ring out, these mysterious bells, for bells they are, peal forth their sweet notes in perfect time and tune with the piano, first one note near the stage on the right-hand side of the house and the next note from the left-hand side at the rear of the house, and so on.

One of the newest educational methods yet tried out by a railroad is soon to be put into effect on the Central of Georgia Railway. This is the teaching of train operation by moving pictures.

As a feature of the educational system that is to be inaugurated on the Central, April 1st, a moving picture course in train operation is to be offered the colored laborers and others of the more ignorant employees of the road.

It is believed that by the use of moving pictures the colored laborers can be successfully taught the fundamentals of railroading where text-books would be unsuited to the task. D. C. Buell, chief of the educational bureau of the Harriman lines, who is now in Savannah, will collect the pictures that will be shown, and will map out the details of the course.

From an article in a recent issue of the New York Sun in which the growth of the moving picture house figures largely, we quote the following:

"Not the least interesting part of the recent business on account of theatrical improvement is the quality of buildings being planned for some of the more prominent sites. During the last week two deals reported from the upper West Side included provision for buildings to cost $400,000 and $250,000 each. One of these structures is to have as special features assembly halls, a rathskeller and a roof garden. Two other such structures for which plans were filed during the last month call for expenditures of $90,000 and $150,000 respectively. Of the total building activity in February this grade of construction furnished more than one-fifth in the Borough of Manhattan."

It is estimated that within the last month real estate taken for use by theatrical interests has involved upwards of $2,000,000.

"It may be interesting to the trade to know that there is now in construction a new theatre on Second avenue, Seattle, Wash., to be called the Melbourne Theatre, of which Mr. Herman Brown is manager. This theatre will probably cost in the neighborhood of thirty-five thousand dollars, and I might say that it has one of the best locations in Seattle, and has also contracted for our Independent service. It now seems certain that practically every star of prominence on the American stage will be canned, via the motion picture process, for the edification of future film audiences.

The managers of such well-known stars as David Warfield, Maude Adams and John Drew naturally objected to a film reproduction of acting for which another clientele is asked $2 per seat. To meet this objection, the picture men have agreed to withhold a showing of each film until after the death of the principal actor concerned.

All of the famous stars will be posed at once. They will either be paid immediately for their services, or their heirs may collect a weekly royalty on the exhibition of the pictures after their death.

The possibilities of this new enterprise are wonderful to contemplate. Playgoers of succeeding centuries may not only read about the noted actors of the twentieth century, but may see them in their best roles, and through the medium of the gramophone, may even hear them read their lines.—Seattle, Wash., Times.

OUR "ROVER" COMES TO LIFE AGAIN

Our "Roving Commissioner," kept busy for some time past in other departments of the magazine, took a sudden spurt during the past week and ran riot across the river in the neighborhood of Fort Lee and Coytesville. He speaks:

The Revelations of a Look in at the Eclair Studio

"It wasn't such a bad trip after all—a train uptown, a cross-town car and then the ferry; and after that a winding ride on the trolley through the Jersey woods, that only need a touch of the green to perfect them; and then at the end of it all a Rover and Brulatour welcome that made me feel glad I had come.

"A run through the Eclair plant and studio is sufficient to account in full for the superb quality of the films which emanate from thence.

"One of the chief attributes which impress themselves on one is the systematic manner in which everything at Eclair is arranged. The studio being new everything is in ship-shape order. Each different set of scenery has its own special 'pigeon hole,' as it were—each one is numbered and when not in use is always to be found in its own special nook. All else about the studio is in accordance with this. Separate dressing rooms are accorded the stars, hot and cold water is to be had in each room, and there is an air of comfort, cleanliness and prosperity about the place that is good to see.

"Three excellent films were shown me in the neat little projecting room of Eclair, which is not only fireproof, but is also comfortably equipped with easy chairs that make the visitor feel cosy.

"'A Living Memory,' is a beautiful film with a pure, clean sentiment. It is permeated with an atmosphere so wholesome that the most fastidious mother could not object to her child seeing it.

"The story is of a man who had lived for years in retirement, clinging to the memory of the woman he had loved, but who had married another. He keeps constantly before him the dream face of his beautiful love.

"One day when he is sitting in his library gazing at a photograph of his lost love and brooding over by-gone days the maid announces a young woman. He reads the note brought by her which proves to be from his former sweetheart, written on her death bed, and which contains a request from her to take her child and care for her.

"The young girl, who is the living image of her mother, at once finds a place in his heart, bringing with her into his household the light and sunshine of a young life. A very effective scene is where she opens the long closed shutters and floods the formerly gloomy interior with sunshine.

"A peculiar incident, that in viewing the picture you find yourself unconsciously hoping for, is that the two fall in love. A splendid effect is arrived at when the hero of the story looking in the mirror critically examines the lined face and gray hair of the reflection presented to him there, after which he concludes to marry his protege to a young friend of his. She, however, is not of the same mind, and the close of the story where he finds out that he himself is really the object of her affections is a touching and beautiful scene.

"This story is so thoroughly human, so true to life, so unique in circumstance that it clings to one and is not soon forgotten.

"'A Living Memory' was staged by Mr. Arnaud, the clever young French director of the Eclair Company. His conception and interpretation of the story with the aid of his clever and sympathetic helpers, Mr. Francis and Miss Dorothy Gibson, is wonderfully and delicately beautiful.

"The other two pictures which were shown to me and which were also very fine productions, but which for lack of space I shall not be able to enlarge upon at this writing, are, 'The Letter with the Black Seals,' for release April 2d, and 'Little Hands,' for release April 9th.

Champion Productions Wonderfully Improved

"Not since the erection of the splendid new Champion studio have I had the pleasure of a 'look in' at the producing quarters of this deserving Independent firm.

"As every home has its own particular atmosphere, so has each individual moving picture plant a spirit all its own which bobs and winks at you from every nook and cranny.

"At Champion there is a cosy homeyness that makes you feel charitable toward everybody as you warm your face in the glow of the big coal heater in the office.

"Mark M. Dintenfass, the whole-souled, genial manager of the firm, is a man who in my humble opinion deserves a whole, great big pile of credit.

"One morning not long ago Mark Dintenfass wakened up, sat up in bed, blinked his eyes, shaking his sturdy fist at some imaginary devil, jercek on his clothes and started toward the downtown train with the stride of a man who means to conquer.

"Somebody overheard Mark say a cuss word or two as he entered his office that day, a thing which was never known to occur before. The air kind of whizzed around the room for a while, a general house cleaning of people and things ensued, and lo! and behold!! the Champion set a new, bright face, clean side outward to the public.

"Now I want to tell you something right here: Champion has some dandy stuff ready right now for the market—films that won't take a back seat for anybody—splendid in photography, staging and acting.

"One of the daintiest comedies that I have seen in some time is that one of Champion's staged by Mr. Hunt, entitled, 'A Night's Adventure.' It is clean and wholesome, and full of 'laugh.' Just the story of three girlish girls who were frightened by burglars and rescued by 'the boys' after the robbers, frightened at the apparitions, had fled, thinking that they were pursued by ghosts.

"This should be an excellent seller, and is worthy of a place in all the best theatres in the country. It will be released March 25th.

"'Kid Canfield' speaks for itself. An Australian lady of culture who viewed the picture with me, spoke repeatedly of its excellent quality on our way to the city. It is full of tense situations and the story of the gambler is splendidly told. It is an enlightenment and a lesson to those inclined toward the evil practice. The scenes are as follows: 'As a Boy,' 'As a Youth,' 'As a Man,' 'The Moth and the Flame,' 'His Own Brother,' 'His Reformation,' 'The Expose.'

"Then comes 'Ireland and Israel,' a splendid example of the brotherhood of man minus the race prejudice, which is ever a hindrance to our better civilization.

"A point of great interest in this film is the prize fight with 'Sharkey' as referee. This story is also full of good, clean comedy.

"We give the glad hand to Champion with kindest wishes for recognition of its good work."

"THE ROMANCE OF AN OLD MAID"

Imp Drama of March 25, 1912

In "The Romance of an Old Maid" a distinct departure from conventionality of theme has been made by the Imp director and acting forces. More often than not the character of an old maid, both on the stage and in the moving picture play, has been made the pivot of ridicule, if not of humor. Here again, we have but the reflex of ordinary life. Everybody knows that the very term of "old maid" is a synonym for more or less unkind derision. Thinking people, however, who form the minority of the public, take other views; they recognize that age in a man or a woman is not necessarily coincident with lack of sympathy, goodness of heart and general usefulness in the scheme of life. It is the latter view which animates this story.

Julia Wheaton, engaging in philanthropic work in the East Side of New York, found it her duty to help reform a workman who was unfortunately addicted to alcohol.

Incidentally she took an interest in little Lucille, the man's daughter, for whom she conceived a great liking. But it is a difficult matter to reform a man. Men are not easily reformed and Frank Rogers resented the inroads which Julia was making in the affections of his daughter, and he forcibly insisted on keeping possession of the girl.

But Julia was undaunted; she persevered and succeeded in obtaining a position for Frank, and Frank rose to the occasion. He stuck to his work, became a new and better man, and during his regeneration discovered that he had a fondness for his benefactress, and that she returned the sentiment.

The final result was that they were married. In marrying, Julia Wheaton surprised her friends and relatives, who had grown hardened to the conviction that she had passed the age or opportunity of sentiment.

This sympathetic play is very well acted by Rolinda Bainbridge as Julia Wheaton, King Baggot as Frank Rogers, Gladys Eagan as little Lucille. James Hopkins is played by William E. Shay.

SARAH BERNHARDT

Madame Sarah Bernhardt holds her reputation as an honorable business woman as dear as her fame as an artist. When after long deliberation and thorough study of motion photography she decided to pose before the motion picture camera that she might have her genius recorded on the film for this generation and the generations to come to see and admire, she entered into a contract with the famous Film d'Art Company, of Paris, to appear exclusively in its studios for the balance of her career. She received an advance payment of $30,000 before posing for "Camille," which up to the present is the only play she has done for motion pictures. Upon the sale of the immensely popular photo-play "Camille," she received a royalty in addition to the bonus. The North American rights of the Bernhardt "Camille" were sold to the French-American Film Company, of New York, by the Film d'Art, the parent company.

Bernhardt entered upon the motion picture stage with the enthusiasm of a girl. The photo record proved to be a marvelous one and the greatest artist of this or any other time has repeatedly visited the exhibitions of her "Camille" in Paris bringing parties of friends with her. The elite of Paris have applauded the splendid projections of the Divine Sarah in her greatest role and she is eager to have her entire repertoire done by the Film d'Art. Lately there have been rumors that Bernhardt contemplated posing in other studios or had already done so, thus working a great injury to the Film d'Art and its affiliated companies throughout the world, which had invested a fortune in the photo-play "Camille" as the first and only existing record of Bernhardt in motion pictures and one that her contract forbade her duplicating. These ugly rumors came to Bernhardt; she acted promptly. Sending for her attorneys she denied the stories of her posing outside the studios of the Film d'Art and in response to a cablegram from the French-American Film Company's office, in the Times Building, New York, wrote the following letter which she insisted that she would follow up with an affidavit if the tales reflecting upon her integrity continued:

Paris, March 2d, 1912.

French-American Film Company,
New York.

Gentlemen:

I have not posed nor contracted to pose for any motion pictures whatever except with the Film d'Art Company, of Paris, for whom I have already done "Camille" as a photo-play, the North American rights of which are exclusively controlled by the French-American Film Company, of New York. My contract with the Film d'Art Company covers my every appearance for motion pictures.

Sincerely yours,
(Signed) SARAH BERNHARDT.

Madame Sarah Bernhardt over her own signature thus puts an end to the babblers who, careless of her honor, would stain her life-long reputation for business integrity for the sake of a few lines of print. Furthermore she exclaimed angrily to Albert Mayer, the attorney in Paris for the French-American Film Company:

"I hold a contract sacred; how dare they caluminate me. I will co-operate in any measure to punish them."

Meanwhile "Camille" and its associated photo-play, Rejane in "Sans Gene," are the greatest sellers that the motion picture world has ever known. Bernhardt is just as great as a film as she is as a living, speaking star. Her magical genius captivated the camera and made it give dazzling results. The record of her "Camille" marks the highest point yet reached in motion picture photography. But few States are left for prospective buyers and immediate action is necessary to secure territory.

St. Paul, Minn.—Litt & Dingwall, of New York, owners of the Grand Theatre, which was destroyed by fire, have decided to rebuild.

New Orleans, La.—Herman Fichtenbery will erect a new picture theatre on Canal street, at a cost of $100,000.

Clovis, Cal.—Frank Brown and M. Hole will erect an opera house on Fifth street.

BY VIRGINIA WEST

Adapted from Majestic Synopsis

YOUNG JOHN DAVIS, attorney at law, was the catch of the town. Many young hearts fluttered as he passed down the street carrying his head high and his athletic shoulders with perfect poise. But John was totally unconscious of the conquests he might have made. He was thinking of one girl, and only one.

This girl was Dorothy Sterling. Only the night before she had confessed her love to and for John Davis, and thus made him—in his own opinion—the happiest man on earth.

But joy is seldom given to us unalloyed, so John was now on his way to ask the consent of Mrs. Sterling to his marriage to Dorothy.

If anyone had known this young man's errand and had seen his face as he came down the steps of his sweetheart's home he would certainly have known what Mrs. Sterling's answer had been. What she had said was: "Mr. Davis, there is not another young man in the town whom it would have pleased me more to have Dorothy select for a husband."

Then they talked over plans for a reception at which the announcement should be made. The date was set for a month later, and the guests were to be the most intimate friends of both families.

When the announcement was made all were loud in their congratulations. Loudest of all was one Mr. William Smith, a slender little man without a wife, but always sincerely interested in another man's prospects of having that blessing.

"My dear John," he said, "you are the most fortunate man in the world. Dorothy is the finest girl in town. By Jove, man, she's almost too good for you. She is too good for any other man."

And to Dorothy he said: "I know it is not customary to congratulate the prospective bride, but I must tell you, my young lady, you are getting a mighty fine young man. I reckon there's many a girl would like to be in your shoes. Better hold him tight. Some other woman might steal him."

And Mr. and Mrs. Jones were very pleased. As friends of both families, they were particularly interested in the welfare of the young people.

The next day Mr. John Davis didn't feel much like work. His mind was everywhere but on his business. He dismissed his stenographer earlier than usual, and shortly after jumped into his car and started for a spin.

He had not gone a dozen blocks when he noticed a young woman supporting herself by a telegraph pole, as if she were unable to walk. He ordered his chauffeur to stop, and he quickly ran to the girl's side.

"Why, Miss Hubbard!" he exclaimed, in surprise, as he came near her. "What in the world is the matter?"

"Oh, Mr. Davis," answered the girl, almost in tears, "I have strained my ankle very badly. I slipped on the ice."

So Mr. Davis kindly put the girl in his car and took her quickly to her home.

By the time they reached the girl's home she was in such severe pain that she was almost fainting. Of course, Mr. Davis, as any decent young man would have done, put his arm around Miss Hubbard and assisted her into the house.

Unfortunately for Mr. John Davis, just at that moment, when he was walking to the house with his arm around his stenographer, looking down most solicitously into her face—just at that time, I say, Mr. William Smith chose to pass near by on his before-dinner walk. When he recognized the young fellow he stopped still in astonishment. Then he walked slowly on, shaking his head and murmuring to himself, "Dear, dear, oh, dear. And so soon, so soon!"

It was the custom of Mr. Jones to leave his office rather early and drop into the club for a little chat and a smoke before going home to dinner. On this particular afternoon he found there, as usual, his friend Smith; but there was an air of unusual sadness about him.

"What's wrong with you?" asked Jones, after they had sat in silence for some time.

"Nothing," sighed Smith. "Nothing at all."

Jones knew his friend too well to accept this statement, so he said:

"Last night's eatin's disagree with you?"

"No, oh, no," replied Smith. "Very digestible food, very."

"Business, perhaps?"

"No, business very good, very good, indeed."

A bright idea struck Jones, and a smile lighted up his face.

"Aha!" he exclaimed, shaking his finger at Smith. "Perhaps, you too are going to be married?"

Smith gave his friend a withering look. "Absurd, man, absurd," he said.

"Well, dad blame it, man, what is the matter?"

Smith sadly shook his head and said nothing.

Jones was growing red in the face and looking very much as if he would be compelled to do something to Smith very shortly, when young Davis hurried into the room and exchanged a few words with one or two friends. He bowed pleasantly to Smith and Jones.

When Davis had left the room again, Jones, having recovered his composure, turned again to Smith and remarked: "That fellow's a lucky dog. Dorothy Sterling is a very fine girl. Why, by gad, if I were a bit younger—and of course, single—I'd try to get her myself."

Smith slowly lowered his head and looked at Jones over his glasses.

"A sad case," he said, sighing deeply; "a very sad case."

"What the devil's the matter with you?" exclaimed Jones, again getting excited. "You act like a crazy man. What is there sad about a beautiful young girl and a fine young fellow getting married, I'd like to know. You're a dummed old fool's what you are."

Smith looked at him pityingly.

"There are some things you don't know, Jones," he said sadly, and then leaning mysteriously toward him he whispered, "I have just made a terrible discovery!"

"You've—you've made a terrible discovery—about young Davis?" asked Jones, aghast.

Smith nodded.

"For Heaven's sake, tell me what it is," urged Jones.

Smith looked around him cautiously, and hitched his chair a little nearer.

"I saw," he began impressively, "I saw, this very afternoon, John Davis taking an auto ride with a beautiful young lady not his fiancée." He paused to see the effect. "And I saw them leave the car and go into a house with his arm lovingly around her waist. There!"

Jones was astounded. "Young Davis is a scoundrel!" he cried. "A dirty blackguard!"

When Jones reached home he found his wife buried in the evening paper.

"Sit down, dear, and I'll read you what the paper says about the Sterling reception," she said. "It is a splendid account. It gives a beautiful description of my gown."

Jones grunted.

"Don't you want to hear it?"

Jones grunted again.

"I don't understand your grunts, dear," said Mrs. Jones sweetly. "Couldn't you say 'yes' or 'no'?"

"I don't want to hear anything about that scoundrel, John Davis!" growled Jones.

"You don't—why—why, what do you mean?" asked Mrs. Jones, in surprise.

"Just what I say. Poor little Dorothy! The black villain!"

"My dear husband," said Mrs. Jones anxiously, "what can you mean? It was only last night I heard you tell Dorothy what a fine young man she was getting for a husband."

"Yes, but that was last night, and this is to-day," cried Jones excitedly.

"Calm yourself, my dear, and tell me about it," and she drew her husband to a seat beside her.

"Well, you see, Smith was taking a walk this afternoon and saw John and a fine-looking girl taking an auto ride. They were having a fine time, he said, and they went into a road-house, he with his arm around her." He paused for breath. "Now, what do you think of that?"

"Horrible!" exclaimed Mrs. Jones. "Does Dorothy know this?"

"No."

"Well, then, I must go to her at once."

"You must—you must go—what are you going to do?" cried Mr. Jones.

"I am going," said Mrs. Jones calmly, "to tell Dorothy and her mother what I know."

"But you can't," cried Jones wildly. "You can't. Smith told me. If he had wanted them to know he would have gone to tell them."

"Perhaps Mr. Smith doesn't see his duty as I do. It is a very unpleasant one, but my duty none the less, and I must do it," replied Mrs. Jones, with pious dignity.

Jones groaned. He knew there was no use arguing.

So Mrs. Jones went to do her duty.

Let it not be understood that this lady was a malicious tale-bearer. By no means! Nor was it her desire to get others into trouble. It was only that she had a great passion for truth, and was always perfectly sure of her duty where others were concerned.

But the lady had a very fertile imagination, and sometimes the facts that went into her ears slightly differed from those that came out of her mouth.

When Dorothy and her mother came down to the parlor to see Mrs. Jones, she kissed the girl and took Mrs. Sterling's hand warmly in hers.

"My dears," she said, "I have come to you on a most unpleasant errand."

"Why, my dear Mrs. Jones," said Mrs. Sterling questioningly.

"I think you know that I am ready to do my duty, no matter how unpleasant it may be."

"Yes, yes. Pray go on," urged Dorothy.

"It is about Mr. Davis—Dorothy's fiancée."

"Oh, what has happened to him?" cried Dorothy.

"Nothing. But he is not what you think him."

"Oh, Mrs. Jones, I really cannot listen to this!" exclaimed the girl indignantly.

"I am only doing my duty," said Mrs. Jones quietly. "Let me tell you, and then you may judge for yourself."

"Yes, it is best for us to know," Mrs. Sterling answered. "Try to listen calmly, Dorothy. Very well, Mrs. Jones."

"Well," began that lady, with an air of great importance. "Well, it is the talk of all the clubs in town that John Davis has been seen riding with a gorgeously dressed, brazen-looking woman, his feeling for whom he made no effort to conceal. They dined at Miller's Café —you know what a reputation it has, my dear. Of course, they had a private room and—and—— Well, I think that is all I heard, but you can imagine, my dear——"

Yes, Dorothy could imagine, and her heart was broken. She threw herself into her mother's arms, sobbing.

"Let her have it out, it is the best thing she could do," advised Mrs. Jones.

"Thank you for coming to us," said Mrs. Sterling sadly. "Of course, it was best for us to know."

And Mrs. Jones, content in the knowledge of a duty well done, went peacefully home.

The next morning Mr. John Davis was somewhat surprised to see his sweetheart enter his private office and without a word throw upon his legal desk his recently purchased and very expensive engagement ring.

"Dorothy, what is the meaning of this?" he cried.

But Dorothy had already reached the door and was about to leave the room.

He gently but very firmly took her from the door and stood with his back against it.

"Now, Dorothy," he said gently, "I must know what this means. I have a right to know. If I have offended you in any way you must tell me, for I am unconscious of it."

So Dorothy told him of Mrs. Jones' visit and her story.

With set jaws and clenched fists he strode to the other end of the room. In that moment the girl slipped through the doorway and was gone.

Then John Davis sat down to think. It was not long until his quick, legal mind had ferreted out the foundation of the story. And he was as quick to see the remedy. He went to the telephone and ordered his touring car. "I guess that will be big enough," he said grimly.

The first address he gave to the chauffeur was that of Mrs. Jones.

That lady was somewhat surprised to see Mr. John Davis in her parlor that time of day, and a little shocked, perhaps. But it was her custom to be polite to every one so she greeted him sweetly.

John did not take the offered hand. "Mrs. Jones," he said coldly, "you will kindly tell me who told you the story you told to Mrs. Sterling and her daughter last night?"

"Why, I—I—— Oh, I couldn't tell you that, Mr. Davis," she answered nervously.

"Well, you will tell me, or I'll be compelled to have you indicted for slander," answered John, in desperation.

Mrs. Jones hesitated for a moment, and then said, very rapidly:

"My husband told me, but he got it from Mr. Smith —Mr. William Smith."

"Very well, come with me, please." And he looked so fiercely at poor Mrs. Jones that she didn't dare do anything but grab her bonnet and coat and run.

Mrs. Jones once established in his car, Mr. Davis gave orders to drive quickly to Mr. Jones' place of business.

"But, my dear sir, it is not slander. You were seen," protested Mr. Jones, as John dragged him off to the automobile.

"Never mind about my being seen," said John. "We'll attend to that when we get Smith." And away they whirled to Mr. Smith's office.

What Smith said was: "It is sad, my dear young man, very sad, but I saw you with your arm around the young lady, and——"

"You'll have a chance to see her again now," said John, as the car sped up the street.

He fairly flew up the steps of Dorothy's house and into the front hall unannounced.

"Dorothy," he called, "Dorothy!" The girl appeared with a look of astonishment on her face.

"Come on, I've got them all, and I'm going to take them to the 'brazen woman's' house. Come on, you've got to go too."

Dorothy allowed herself to be carried away almost without knowing what she was doing.

In a few minutes they were admitted to the sitting-room of Miss Hubbard's home. The girl was sitting in a Morris chair, with her bandaged foot on a stool in front of her.

"Miss Hubbard, kindly tell these ladies and gentlemen the circumstances of your accident and the way you got home. Also the time of day it happened," said John quietly, and with the air of a lawyer.

The girl did not understand, but did as she was told.

"Oh, John," said Dorothy. "Can you ever forgive me? I am so ashamed."

"Yes, gladly, if you are convinced that these old idiots don't know what they are talking about," said John.

"Indeed I am, and I am so happy," and she unblushingly kissed her lover before everybody. "Now come with me to your office."

"Why there?" asked John in surprise.

"Never mind; I want to go," she insisted.

In the meantime the three old gossips were eying each other and John.

"Really," said Mr. Smith, "I don't see how it all happened. I said very little, very little."

"Never mind about that," said John as he led his sweetheart from the room. "You just keep quiet about other people's affairs and others won't have a chance to exaggerate."

Turning to Miss Hubbard, he said, "I'll see you again in a short while, Miss Hubbard."

When he and Dorothy reached the office she began to look for the ring.

"Oh, it's the ring you want?" said John, for the first time realizing the reason for her visit there. "I'll help hunt."

Together they looked in every corner. Finally John gave a triumphant cry, "I see it!"

"Where?"

"Guess."

"I don't know. Tell me."

Then he dipped one finger into the ink well and pulled out Dorothy's engagement ring.

"Is it ruined?" she cried."

"Not a bit of it," answered John as he rolled it about in his handkerchief.

"Put it on again," she said, holding out her left hand and leaning her head against his arm.

Very gently he took the hand.

"Will you ever doubt me again?" he asked.

"Never! Never!" she said, and sealed the promise with a kiss.

QUESTION OF PATENTS

By an oversight, quite inadvertently, we omitted to mention in the machines for projection the Mirror Vital of our good friend, Eberhard Schneider, of 219 Second avenue, near Fourteenth street. His machine is well known and of good value. Eberhard Schneider stands foremost as one of the first inventors who rejected the license of the Patents Company.

New York, N. Y.—Henry Martinson will erect a new vaudeville and motion picture house at Seventh avenue and One Hundred and Thirty-first street, at a cost of $135,000. Will have seating capacity of 1,400.

New York, N. Y.—Norman Lederer has plans for a new theatre to be erected at Amsterdam avenue and One Hundred and Fifty-seventh street. The Riverside Viaduct Realty Company is the owner. Will cost $45,000.

OPERATORS' PAGE

By Esau Shindler

Boston, Mass., Feb. 28, 1912.

Fellow Operators:

I can now let you know that I am going to take charge of this page hereafter, and I want to hear from every operator in the business. I want you fellows to write me the news, happenings, troubles, and also let us know how your booth looks. Let us know about your machines and send us pictures of your booth so we can put them in the News, etc. Now, boys, don't be bashful and let us hear from you, and let us make an operators' page for one and all.

Yours very respectfully,

ESAU SHINDLER.

* * * *

I have taken the pleasure to visit the Jolliette Theatre, Boston, to-day and can say that I have never seen a picture projected on a screen any better than I saw there. They have two Powers', six machines and a dissolving stereopticon. The picture is steady and you could hardly see it shake a little sideways. I also give credit to the able and good operators of that house, who are Mr. George S. Grott and Mr. Henry W. Schumaker, both members of the Operators' Union, Boston Local No. 182. The credit is due to them because I could not see a yellow corner on the screen through the whole show, and not only that, but the way they watched the screen for frame-ups and how they watched the aperature plate for a good light on the screen.

* * * *

The Union operators of Boston are pretty strong and good in their work, and to join the Union in Boston one must be able to pass a good and hearty examination. Many non-union operators have I seen that did not have the patience to watch the screen, to look out for their light, and would leave the picture out of frame for a couple of minutes, or he might be asleep and his fire shutter dropping down on him about ten times each reel he would run, and the drummer would have to wake him up by pounding on his bass drum as a signal. Such fellows, of course, would not be admitted to the Boston Union.

There is one thing I like to see and that is the operator watch his screen, and if he does, he is sure to be all right with his work. Now, fellows, I want you all to watch the screen of the Operators' Page and send some matter in to frame it up and keep it in good focus.

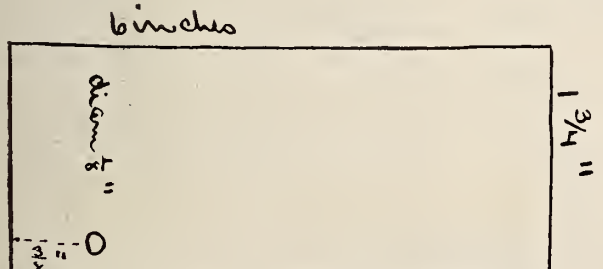
Yours very truly,

ESAU SHINDLER.

Charlestown, Mass., Mar. 9, 1912.

Editor of Operators' Page:

Dear Sir:—I wish to compliment the News on having introduced an operators' page. This is the one thing that has been needed to make the News the best periodical of its kind. I am sure my fellow operators will appreciate the great advantages offered by the chat column, and where they can air their troubles and send in their ideas.



I would like to ask some operator who has used it successfully to give me the details of a spotlight made with a tin dipper and a condenser. I have tried it one way but I cannot get a successful light.

Here is a little one I doped out myself and it gives the most clearly defined spot I've ever seen. Take a piece of ordinary thin tin and cut out a rectangle about 6 x 1¾ inches, about 2 inches from the bottom and about ⅜ of an inch from the side, punch a round hole about ⅛ of an inch in diameter. Open the gate of your picture machine and put this right up against the aperture plate, then snap the gate shut, fasten up your fire shutter, and throw on the light. I've experienced a great deal of difficulty in making the hole perfectly round and smooth, but by using a very fine rat-tail file, I eventually procured the desired result.

That is a best spot for the singer that would not materially affect the song slides if having a dissolving stereopticon. At first you will find it hard to place the spot in the right place, but a little practice will soon remedy this. By reversing the tin, you can put the spot on either side of the stage and after closing the gate, enough of it will stick up so that you can raise or lower the spot.

I hope some of the boys can use this and that I have helped somebody by sending it in. I am a member of Local No. 182 and hope some of the boys will send in their ideas. Wishing your page every success in the world and hoping that it will gain more and more in popularity every day, I am,

Yours very truly,

H. W. S.,
Charlestown, Mass.

P. S.—I will send details of construction of a traveling spot like the above later.

To H. W. S.,
Charlestown, Mass.

Good for you, brother from Charlestown. I thank you very much for letting us hear from you. I am sure that our brother operators will appreciate your favor in sending in your spotlight scheme. And I agree to say that it is one of the neatest spotlights that could be made, for I have seen it working and it proves very useful. I also hope some brother will give us the spotlight you request. Let us hear from you again.

ESAU SHINDLER.

Editor of the Chat Column:

Dear Sir: Having received the News this week, I was glad to read the article stating that we were going to have a Chat Page. I am positive this is just the thing we fellows need. I have been an operator for the last two years and hardly had any trouble with the machine I work with; there is only one fault I have, and that is the cracking of the condensers of my machine. Just as soon as I place new ones in they crack. I would like to have some of the boys write me, letting me know if this can be remedied.

Hoping to hear from you soon, I remain,

Yours very respectfully,

M. R.

Dear M. R.:

In reply to your letter I can say that I am very glad to hear from you, Brother Missouri, and in regards to your statement about your condensers, you have not stated the dimensions of the booth you work in; if I knew them, I could give you a more exact excuse for the cause of your condensers cracking so often. If the booth you work in is very small and close, that might be the cause. And if not, it might be caused by your opening your lamp-house too soon, not giving your carbons and condensers a chance to cool off. It may be your carbons are too close to the condensers. I would advise you to look after these things and try a larger size condenser.

Hoping this will remedy your case, I remain,

EDITOR.

MR. ALMOST BUTT MR. ALMOST BUTT MR. ALMOST BUTT

HERE HE IS!

The mystery is solved! Mr. Almost Butt is not the name of a film. He is a moving picture camera man—the leading character in a series of excruciatingly funny cartoons which will appear every week in "The Implet" and nowhere else. The series is entitled "The Adventures of Mr. Almost Butt." Each picture will show how close he comes to getting a grand scoop. But there is always a BUT to foil him! Mr. Butt is the brain-child of one of the highest salaried newspaper cartoonists in America. If you are not getting "The Implet" now, send in your name and address and the name of your theatre this very day. "The Implet," 102 West 101st street, New York. Just say "I want Mr. Butt every week!"

MOVING PICTURES TO SHOW SENIOR EVENTS AT CALIFORNIA UNIVERSITY

San Francisco, Cal., Feb. 29, 1912.

Editor Moving Picture News:

Dear Sir:—The good work of the News is producing results. In a recent conversation with one of the members of the Class 1912 of the University of California, it transpired that the News and its continued hammering at the subject of educational films has set the students and professors thinking.

The direct result of this is very well outlined in the annexed cutting from the Daily Californian, a paper published by the students during the college year.

When the presentation referred to is made, a film will be taken recording this new feature, which is certain to be followed as an annual custom. The University of California is setting a mark in its adaptation of modern science. Good luck to it.

LINDSAY BANCROFT.

A senior record of a thoroughly new character will be left behind by the class of 1912 this year, says the Daily Californian. All the events in the remaining two months of the semester, particularly those of the senior week, the class pilgrimage, graduation, and class day, will be photographed as moving pictures.

The idea of using the moving picture film for a record of class happenings was thought of first merely as a means of entertainment at future reunions. This idea was later enlarged to include more than senior activities, and as the plan stands at present the films will be a pictorial record of all the coming college events. Among these will be Labor Day, the Spring Festival and the track and baseball contests.

The seniors will endeavor to have their custom continued in succeeding classes. A film will probably be presented to the University. The custom has been originated with the idea of encouraging similar pictorial records to be kept by the University itself.

The moving picture machine as a recorder of college life is an entirely untried experiment. No universities of the country have used a similar means.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

RATHER SENSATIONAL

Our good friend, Mr. A. Van Buren Powell, a successful scenario writer, like Silas Wegg, has dropped into poetry anent those sensations familiar to every writer. Following are Mr. Powell's verses:

Several Sensations

Did you ever have that feeling
Of depression?
When the manuscripts you write
(Your profession)
Gobble up a bunch of stamps,
Visit 'round at all the camps
And return to you like tramps
In procession.

Did you ever have that feeling
Of elation?
When you open envelopes
In rotation,
Saying, "Here's one back, no doubt,"
But instead a check drops out
And you fairly want to shout
"Jubilation!"

NEW FORM LETTER

Imp Films Company has followed the lead of the Lubin Company and is sending out a rejection form. The following reasons for the unavailability of a script, with a check opposite the particular fault of the story under consideration, are printed on the form:

1. Not available for present use.
2. Not sufficient humor for a comedy.
3. Requires environment which would necessitate too much expense to stage correctly.
4. Would not pass the National Censorship Board.
5. Identical to magazine story.
6. Similar theme used before.
7. Could be used for magazine story, but would fail to get over in a picture.
8. Indian or Wild West stories undesirable.
9. Not sufficient action to theme.
10. Too conventional.
11. Too small a cast to make interesting picture.
12. Too melodramatic.
13. Not in proper scenario form.
14. Plot not strong enough.
15. Lacks moral tone.
16. Too unpleasant.
17. Too improbable.

IMP SCENARIO CONTEST

The scenario contest recently decided by the Imp Films Company is good proof that the field of scenario writing is not overcrowded. The contest attracted world-wide attention and bales of scripts from both sides of the Atlantic were submitted. The contest, according to the Imp readers, demonstrated that comparatively few writers have grasped the essential requirements of moving picture making. Old themes, impossible stories, and stories beyond the limitations of the screen were submitted in amazing numbers not only by the amateur but by professional writers of fiction. The Imp readers say that it is worthy of note that three winners out of four in the contest were experienced writers of scenarios, thus proving that success in this branch of work only results from long experience, application and hard work. "It cannot be too widely known that scenario writing is still a comparatively new, as it is a specialized form of literary construction," is the Imp Films Company assertion.

SCENARIO WRITERS' ASSOCIATION

A correspondent urges us to bring before writers the necessity for "a scenario writers' association for mutual benefit." Such discussion is pure rot. We have urged higher prices for writers and author's credit on the films, and will continue to urge these items. An association of writers to endeavor to force manufacturers into recognizing scripts, not wanted, and to encourage hundreds of impossible writers to pay out good money in dues, is both impracticable and insincere. If a writer has the brains and the goods, he will get along very well without becoming a member of any "association." In fact, membership in such an organization might delay his opportunity to market his work with many moving picture companies.

* * * *

MAJESTIC NEEDS

The Scenario editor of the Majestic Motion Picture Company is desirous of securing farce comedy or drama and is looking chiefly for originality and freshness of plot, character and situation. He will pay suitable prices for contributions embracing the above features.

* * * *

QUESTION OF PRICES

A correspondent wishes us to classify prices paid for scripts from various editors. This is an impossibility. Prices vary. Thirty-five dollars is a top-notch price right now, while many editors continue to send out the ten and fifteen dollar checks. Experience is the best teacher anent the remuneration question. One editor may pay more to one writer than to another. If you don't like the price offered for a scenario you do not have to accept it. "Half a loaf is better than none" is the philosophy of many script writers, and this philosophy is no small factor in keeping down the prices for first-class plots.

* * * *

WITH THE POWERS COMPANY

Four different correspondents are herewith informed that Mr. Giles R. Warren has severed his connection with the Lubin Company and, after much persuasion, has become manager of the scenario and publicity departments of the Powers Picture Company. Alfred Johnson, of Dayton, Ohio, believes Mr. Warren is without a peer in the scenario editorship line. Many others have the same opinion, Brother Johnson. We cannot answer personal questions which include the remuneration paid Mr. Warren and other editors. We will say, however, that Mr. Warren is one of the highest paid editors in the business.

* * * *

PLOTS BEING STOLEN?

We firmly believe that every editor in the independent and licensed camps to-day is an honorable gentleman and would not stoop to filch the ideas of scenario writers. The sooner a certain class of writers get this plot-stealing-bug out of their minds, the better for all concerned. The writer during long experience as a scenario "dopester" never but once had occasion to query on the subject of confliction of ideas. The trouble was immediately and satisfactorily explained. No editor of any reputable company will steal your plots, any more than the editor of any reputable mazagine would print your story without pay. Get down to business and write good "dope" and the plot-stealing-hoodoo will soon be forgotten.

INDEPENDENT ENTERPRISE

Mrs. Lillian Rubenstein writes: "Owing to numerous requests received by me from amateur writers, I have decided to conduct a school for the teaching of the proper technique of the photoplay. For the benefit of the readers of the Moving Picture News, I wish to announce that my school has no connection whatsoever with the Lubin Company, but is an absolutely independent enterprise of my own."

Thanks, comrades, all, for your kind expressions concerning the value of this department. We really didn't know we had so many good friends. A half hundred personal letters prove to us that the "Plots and Plays" department is appreciated, and we are glad.

You all say you like this page. Now, won't you wade right in while the water is fine and write some of your experiences and your ideas for the benefit of others? Will you not inform your author acquaintances of the merits of this department? We extend a cordial invitation to all writers, both masculine and feminine, to contribute to this department. We wish everyone now struggling for rec- opinions. Names should be signed to all communications, not necessarily for publication, but as evidence of good faith. This is to be a mutual benefit page. Letters from beginners as well as others cordially invited.

"TEMPTED BUT TRUE"
Imp Drama of March 28, 1912

There are some stories which though they may appear trite to the blasé student of fiction and drama may, nevertheless, have a moral which always pays on repetition. There is not anything particularly new about the story of "Tempted but True." Still, when we reflect on the words of a recent preacher that a girl's life on Broadway is not always, or even frequently, "silk stockings and champagne," a film which drives home this point is bound to have a certain preventive value wherever shown.

Any infraction of morality brings its own punishment. This is the thing that is dinned into our ears from the pulpit and demonstrated to us in good books, good pictures, etc., every day of our lives.

The young girl in this picture tired of the humdrum village life and so she went to a big city and secured a position. The freedom of boarding house life at first attracted her. It was a change and it was a relief from the irksome monotony of her home town life. Of course she had adventures and she became the near-victim in a bogus marriage.

But in her home town she had left behind a faithful heart. He was a rugged fellow and a blacksmith, and when the girl's silence had almost driven her parents to distraction, he made for the great city in search of his sweetheart. He found her only to be spurned, but he persevered in his quest. He routed a gang of conspirators who were inveigling the girl into a false marriage, and was successful in persuading her to go home.

They meet at the depot and return together. The girl had been sorely tempted, but she remained true, and thus a happy marriage loomed in the near future for the honest blacksmith and his sweetheart.

Vivian Prescott plays the part of the tempted girl and King Baggot is the honest blacksmith who unraveled the wicked plots of the city chaps.

ODYSSEY CAMPAIGN A SENSATION FROM START TO FINISH
Nearly All State Rights Sold

Winding up a wondrous publicity campaign on Homer's "Odyssey," the Monopol Film Company states that but few minor rights remain unsold.

From start to finish the publicity promotion on the "Odyssey" was a revelation—from day to day something new in the film world was sprung—when one thing passed by it was another, and with the oncoming of Homer's "Odyssey" there came a newness of method that the film industry has already taken into account. Old methods were abandoned, new and daring schemes engineered, and the film world at large gasped at the extravagance of publicity—nothing like it had ever been seen before.

The quick closing out of the "Odyssey" bears testimony of the efficaciousness of the trade and amusement papers, liberal space was used, and tremendous results achieved. Every publicity device known to an experienced circus press agent was adopted, and the results were startling in their quickness.

Frank Winch was engaged to engineer the publicity promotion—that he did, and did well. His advent into the film field was quickly followed by other prominent press agents, and more will follow.

Homer's "Odyssey" is a full two-and-a-half-hours entertainment, comprised of three reels and forty specially made art slides made at considerable expense, the subjects being taken from the various Grecian statuary from the most important museums.

Brother Louis Blumenthal reported that a Powers No. 6, bearing No. 3006, was stolen from the Graham Palace, No. 71 Graham avenue, Brooklyn, on February 27th. The proprietors, Warshoer & Roden, offer $50.00 reward for the return of the machine or the arrest and conviction of the culprit. So brothers, it behooves you to look for No. 3006. I. C.

All visiting brothers are cordially invited to attend. The festivities will commence at 2 p. m. sharp.

As Brother Girvan and myself were walking down Broadway and being in the vicinity of Thirty-first street we decided to pay a visit on Brothers McCree, Strickler and Steele, who handle the projection end of Ganes Manhattan Theatre. As it was my first visit to this cosy little playhouse I had a very agreeable surprise awaiting me in the form of a new departure in picture curtains, the concave screen. I had the principle explained to me by Brother McCree, who has worked for Mr. Ganes for the past five years as chief operator, and with the Simplex machine projecting the silent drama he grew very enthusiastic, and it must have been contagious as Brother Girvan and myself could not help but show our surprise as foot after foot was sent on its journey to the lower magazine; we were escorted from one side of the house to the other and finally standing on the stage, the picture was as sharp as if we had been in the rear of the house. I complimented Brother McCree on his luck by having a combination that any operator should be proud of—a flickerless, steady picture projected by a Simplex machine, operated by the three above-mentioned members of the Auxiliary, and a concave screen. After seeing several acts of a well-balanced vaudeville bill we departed, after receiving much courtesy and a cordial invitation to pay them a visit in the near future, which we gratefully accepted.

Great persons and great inventions are quick to exchange compliments. One of the latest and greatest inventions, the motion picture, honors and holds up for praise another late and great invention, the telephone, in a novel Thanhouser story released Friday, March 29th. The title is "My Baby's Voice," and that just about is the sum and substance of the story. A woman saves her soul by simply hearing her baby's voice—on the telephone. The tempter tries to lure her from her duties by a honeyed message on the 'phone, but just as she is to give an answer an all-wise switchboard operator pulls out the plug connecting the wife's wire with the tempter's and switches the wife's line to her little daughter's room. The child is awakened by the ring of the 'phone bell, and recognizing her mother's voice, says: "Hello, mamma, did you call me?" Whereupon, of course, it is all off with the tempter and his temptation—thanks to the baby's voice, the telephone and the clever hello girl.

SIMPLEX ENDORSEMENT

The Star Palace, Patchogue, N. Y.,
March 11th, 1912.

Simplex Sales Agency,
Dear Sir:

It is with extreme pleasure that I pen these few favorable remarks about your Simplex machine. We have operated one in above-mentioned theatre about four months. The machine is in my estimation the utmost in picture projectors. Any exhibitor who isn't getting a one hundred per cent. perfect picture has no one to blame but himself. A perfect machine will throw a perfect picture and the Simplex is one of the few perfect machines now on the market.

Wishing you all the success in the world. I am, believe me,

Yours to a cinder,
EARL L. HOLMES,
Chief Operator of the Star Palace.

P. S.: If this letter is any use to you in advertising your machine you have my permission to use same.

POWERS PLAYERS HAVE TROUBLE ON MEXICAN BORDER

Owing to an outbreak of the Mexican trouble near Las Cruces, New Mexico, the Powers Motion Picture Company's organization were compelled to temporarily abandon their studio at that place and retire forty miles into the mountains.

The company came very near being embroiled in the battle which took place at Las Cruces, and only escaped by an exceedingly narrow margin. Director O'Brien, however, with an eye for business, managed to secure a good picture of the big fight, which the Powers people will shortly release in a split reel.

Besides Director O'Brien the members of the company are Gladys Fields, Miss Dudley, Leo White, Mrs. Mackin, F. C. McMahon, E. Robles, A. Neilson and others.

"SQUNK CITY FIRE COMPANY"

Imp Comedy Release of March 30

Squnk City did not have a fire brigade, so in solemn meeting the chief men of that famous center of light and leading determined to remedy that condition. All the public spirited citizens got together one night resolved to form a company, and opened a subscription list which was liberally patronized.

There they fell to appointing each other to offices, and when this part of the business was completed the purchasing of the engine was made.

For a long time Squnk City was without a fire, but one night the alarm bell rang and the officers got together in their paraphernalia around the sacred engine. But these wise men had forgotten one essential. They had voted each other into their respective high offices but they had omitted to define their respective duties. So the occupants of the threatened house felt themselves in great danger, whilst the members of the fire company debated amongst themselves as to whose duty it was to start the work of extinction. In the end somebody got to work, and the somebody was a fireman, who in putting out the fire succeeded in winning a wife.

This comedy, which is full of side-splitting humor, won a prize in the Imp Films Company's recent competition.

OUR

"Power" Behind the Machine is perfect projection; that is why

POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH always wins.

The "just as good" may answer in some lines, but not in yours, Mr. Showman. You must have the best. Your audience demands it. You must show them pictures which are absolutely without flicker, which ring true in the fidelity of their reproduction; and that's all they want.

What you want, beside this, is a machine which may be easily operated, whose parts are easy of access, simple in construction, yet firm and rigid of frame, built to stand the daily grind. All these things we accomplish.

When satisfaction is brought to both audience and operator, then is produced the perfect moving picture machine; and that's what POWER'S NO. 6 is.

It satisfies. That's why its sales represent more than 60% of the entire yearly output of all moving picture machines combined.

Isn't that good enough for you?

Proposition D will tell you all about it.

THE FEUDAL DEBT

(Nestor Release)

The California Nestor releases have been causing a great deal of favorable comment. The scenes and subjects chosen by them are especially fine and full of interest.

The past week we were treated to a view of that splendid coming release, "The Feudal Debt."

The story is founded on an old feud between two Southern families. In after years the son and daughter of the murderer and the murdered fall in love. The match is bitterly opposed, with intent to kill, by the brother of the girl, daughter of the dead man. There is, however, a very happy and seemly ending, when through a kink of circumstance, the young lover, who is a doctor by-the-way, saves the life of the mother of his sweetheart, thereby winning the favor and gratitude of the brother.

The story is well worked out and is replete with interesting situations.

Scenes From Forthcoming Gaumont Releases

JIMMIE—TEMPERANCE REFORMER

AN OLD ROMANCE

HE WHO LAUGHS LAST LAUGHS BEST

JIMMIE, TEMPERANCE REFORMER

(Gaumont Release of March 19)

There is a fine temperance lesson in the story of a family of rag pickers, set forth in the Gaumont film entitled, "Jimmie, Temperance Reformer."

The story is one of a happy family of rag pickers, contented with their lot, their only apparent trouble having its origin in the fact that the father finds it hard to let Saturday go by without indulgence in his periodic booze.

Little Jimmie growing tired of this sort of thing decides to teach his father a lesson that he will not soon forget, and one evening the little chap comes home feigning intoxication, kicking things around generally, just as his father has done on similar occasions. The father is so tremendously shocked that he swears off his drinking habits. The close of the picture shows the happy family enjoying a day's outing when Saturday comes around again.

It is a good film of excellent moral quality.

GAUMONT SCORES AHEAD!

Who could believe that in so short a time after the first vague rumor of Captain Scott's arrival at the South Pole a film reproducing the wonderful experiences of the expedition would be billed all over the country for immediate exhibition on their arrival here?

Nevertheless, Gaumont is now offering for sale films which will give a full pictorial account of all the British explorer's hardships, pleasures and frigid zone experiences.

These pictures will be in two reels, and are probably the biggest feature film ever put on the market. Wonderful pictures of the Terra Nova breaking the ice pack, the great ice barrier, life in the Antarctic, the midnight sun in all its splendor, immense flocks of penguins, sports on the ice that never melts, sleighing expeditions.

Captain Scott's trip from his starting point at New Zealand to his winter camp across great barriers of ice is splendidly covered in these pictures.

This film is fully copyrighted and State rights are fully guaranteed by the Gaumont Company, Flushing, N. Y.

Lithographs of all sizes are being prepared, and several varieties of good-sized posters for advertising purposes. An advertising campaign has also been commenced in the newspapers of all the large cities of the United States.

"THE ROMANCE OF AN OLD MAID"
Imp Release, March 25

Probably old maids, so-called, experience the romantic in life more frequently, and at the same time more deeply, than their younger sisters who "go off," in a matrimonial sense, more readily and more impulsively than their elders. A woman may pass into the category of an old maid, and still not be dead to sentiment and affection.

Ruth Dayton, though she was smiled at by her friends and regarded as having reached that stage of life when heart affairs had ceased to trouble her, was nevertheless not lost to possibilities. She was of a philanthropic turn of mind and in her work in the poorer districts at last found herself a victim of the tender passion.

She took an interest in a man who was left a widower and had one little daughter. He was a victim of alcohol, but Ruth perceived in him the makings of a new man, and although he tore his child away and first resented her efforts to assist him, yet in the end she succeeded in persuading him that self-respect was his privilege and not merely a chance possession of life. It was his right and his duty to respect himself.

And more than that, the good-hearted woman was instrumental in obtaining for him a position of trust and responsibility in which he made good. He was so earnest and so successful in his new life that he became a totally changed man with a bright outlook for the future. And his gratitude was his strong point. He was not slow to appreciate the kindliness of the hand which had helped him to do all this.

Indeed, he fell sincerely in love with Ruth, and when he made the admission of his regard for her, he was very agreeably surprised to find that Ruth in her turn had all along taken more than a merely philanthropic interest in his fortune.

So this old maid's romance culminated in her marrying the former widower and becoming a second mother to his little daughter, of whom she was already very fond.

"TEMPTED BUT TRUE"
Imp Release, March 28

John is a village blacksmith, a manly young fellow, wedded to his work and fond of country life. For him the attractions of great cities do not exist. He is happy in the probability of marrying Mary, a farmer's daughter, a pretty, simple-minded girl, apparently contented with her prospects, until she is lured by the hope of earning a living in a great city.

Fired with this ambition she makes for the city and secures a position behind a ribbon counter. Here her good looks attract attention.

She tastes boarding-house life, a phase of existence which is new and fascinating to her. Home seems to have faded from her mind. Neither John nor her parents hear from her.

Her admirer is her employer, but he does not find it an easy thing to succeed in her good graces by the usual cafe methods. So he schemes to entrap her by a bogus marriage.

Meanwhile, John, at home, is getting so anxious for her that he decides to go to the city. He puts up at the very hotel where a plot is in progress to entrap Mary into the marriage. Then John makes his way to the boarding house where Mary is staying, but she, poor girl, repulses homely John, and shows a preference for her city admirer. But John has made the discovery of the proposed bogus marriage. He finds that the marriage license is forged, and before the mischief can be consummated he finds the minister and with him defeats the plot. So that the country girl is rescued from ruin and disgrace.

John and Mary meet at the depot and she agrees to go home with him to their native village.

King Baggot plays John and the part of Mary is entrusted to Vivian Prescott. William Shay is the would-be bogus bridegroom of Mary.

"THE BABY"
Imp Release, March 30

This picture is of scientific interest and it is also blended with a demonstration which will, no doubt, be of service to many women.

A young couple leave their infant in the care of a trained nurse whose duty it is to treat the "little darling" according to the latest methods of scientific hygiene. So we see the pretty nurse undressing the little one, accurately taking the temperature of the water, in which the small body is to be bathed, handling the soap, the absorbent cotton and the other paraphernalia incidental to the function of dressing it.

The baby in our picture is a cute little person who goes through the ordeal with a fair amount of infantile dignity. He cries a little, yet in the end, when he is fully dressed, he appears to have enioved the ordeal to which he has been subjected by the nurse.

When the happy parents of the child arrive, they appear to be exceedingly well pleased at the manner in which their baby has been tended.

The film should be of some educational value to a large number of young women who do not handle their children with the care and precision necessary. It will achieve distinctly valuable results, if it brings home to those minds the great value of soap and water and cleanliness, and above all things the homely lesson that the proper care of small children is the first duty of parents, whether that duty be personally performed or delegated to other hands.

On the same reel:

"SQUNK CITY FIRE COMPANY"

Squnk City was without any adequate protection against fire, should a fire break out, and the worthy citizens of this progressive burg, becoming suddenly alive to the fact, met in solemn conclave. And at that meeting they decided to form a fire brigade.

Money was forthcoming for the purpose. Of course, Squnk City was rich as well as influential. Then the officers were appointed. This one became President; that one became Captain; another became Lieutenant; yet a third became Assistant Lieutenant.

There could not be found in any city in the Union a finer body of amateur firemen than the well uniformed citizens of Squnk City, who had charged themselves with the duty of protecting their beloved city from fire.

For long, long days and nights there was no fire in Squnk City. Then one night the alarm bell rang and each of the officers rose from his bed, clothed himself in his uniform and made his way to the fire station.

There was a fire; not much of a one, it is true, but the Squnk City Fire Brigade, in its articles of organization, had omitted to define the respective duties of the officers.

So that before the work of fire extinction could be begun, there was much dispute amongst these important functionaries as to whose duty it was to first start operations.

However, in the end, the fire was extinguished, not before, though, the inhabitants of a small household were placed in great danger from the tardiness with which these over-officious gentlemen got to work.

THE BIRTHDAY PRESENT
Reliance Release, April 3

Jones gives Brown a birthday present he has bought for his wife to keep for him until the morrow, when he will call for it. He is afraid if he takes it home his wife will find it first. Mrs. Brown sees her husband enter with a package and place it in his bureau drawer. Out of curiosity she opens it and finds a beautiful fan with a card reading "From Darling Tootsie to Dearest Woosie." Vowing to get even on her husband for having an affinity she replaces the fan with a cake of soap and sends her husband off in the morning with the package under his arm in great anticipation of his condition when he returns home at night. Jones calls for the package and goes to present his wife with it. Infuriated at the insult, the wife beats him up thoroughly. Jones, thinking that Brown has played a trick on him by substituting soap for the fan, goes to Brown's office and beats him up in return. Brown goes home to recuperate and his wife receives him with joy, telling him that hereafter he will let affinities alone. When he explains she is infuriated at the Joneses. Jones goes home and tells his wife that he beat up Brown for the trick. She will not believe until she sees Brown, so they repair to Brown's home. When the women meet there is a tornado of argument, and Brown gives Jones the wink, whereat the two men repair to the sideboard with their backs to the women and drink a toast. The two wives see their action and in mutual anger at the two men make up, which results in an all round forgiveness, return of the present and birthday congratulations.

On the same reel:

"LIZARDS"

A few hundred feet of Natural History showing the poisonous and non-poisonous lizards. It is an extremely interesting subject and gives one a splendid idea of the appearance, marking and traits of these little creatures. It also helps do away with the idea that all lizards are dangerous.

"THE TRAMP'S GRATITUDE"

American Release, March 21

The foreman of the Pacific Lumher Co., had given old Bill Meyer a joh around the yard, more out of pity for the forlorn old man than because he was useful. The rest of the workmen around the yard made him the butt of their coarse jokes and at times their attitude to the poor old fellow was merciless.

Learning that the poor old fellow was destitute the foreman took him to his home and gave him a meal and by kind treatment won the old fellow's everlasting gratitude.

Lumber began to disappear from the yard and the owners were at a loss to account for it. Tbey maintained a night watchman and the foreman checked out every stick of lumber that left the yards through the day.

The foreman was questioned but gave such a good account of sales that the owners were satisfied and simply told the night watchman to redouhle his vigilance. And the watchman who is the real thief laughed in his sleeve when he promised. Poor old Bill Meyer was in the habit of sleeping hehind a pile of lumber some distance from the yard, and it happened to he a pile that the watchman had stolen and sold, and it was waiting removal. Lying down he is startled by the slap of a board and looking carefully over the pile sees the watchman's retreating figure.

The next day when the watchman steals upon the foreman to hit him a treacherous blow the old man sees his intention and jumping in between them receives the blow on his own arm. The foreman takes him home where his wife dresses his arm and then gives him a good, substantial lunch. He retires to the lumber pile to eat it, where the watchman finds him and taking his lunch away from him drives him away. Hungry and without shelter the old man passes the night and returns to work in the morning full of resentment. Everybody else had shelter, why not take enough lumher from the enormous pile and build one for himself? That night the watchman was startled by seeing a hoard disappear over the fence.

He gave chase firing as he ran. He lost the man but found the board in the foreman's yard, where the old man had instinctively ran for protection. And then it came to the watchman that here was a chance to divert suspicion from himself and also work the ruin of the man he hated. He hurries to the pile of lumber he had purloined and carries other hoards to join the one the old man had left and puts them all in the foreman's hasement.

The next day he reports to the owner, and accuses the foreman. The foreman indignantly denies it, hut is taken to his own home and confronted with the evidence. But the odd joh man had overheard the watchman's accusation and although there was no suspicion about himself he hurries to the house and confesses his theft of one board. He tells of the watchman's pile and leads the owner to the place he had so long used as sleeping quarters. The foreman is vindicated, the watchman convicted and the poor old odd job man finds a home with the grateful foreman and the wife.

The household retires to rest, and the two men, having arranged their holsters in semblance of two sleeping forms, steal forth on tbeir midnight carousal, and are soon at the cluh, imhihing not wisely hut too well. On the way back home, their friends play a practical joke upon them. Whilst Robert and Smith are wrapped in the arms of Morpheus, they cause two tramps to change clothes with them, and then decamp. When morning comes, Rohert and Smith awake, and a sorry spectacle they present. They hie them homewards, narrowly escaping detection by their wives on their way. The good ladies passing in close proximity to them, imagine the two forms resemble those of their hubbies, and are soon in pursuit. The two men are seen by the servant entering the house, and she, mistaking them for two tramps, invokes the aid of the law, but when the police and the women arrive, Robert and Smith are found comfortably seated, attired in morning coats, enjoying a cigarette.

"OVER A CRACKER BOWL"

Nestor Release, March 23

Romantic Jack Phillips and pretty Betty Kellard suddenly and quietly plunge into the matrimonial sea. They are so happy in each other's love, that for a while neither thinks of sending out the glad tidings to near and dear friends. Dick Edmonds, Jack's closest pal of bachelor days, is the first to hear the news. In a letter, Jack invites him to call and make himself at home. Dick buys some presents for the newlyweds and starts on his journey to visit them.

A rift in the lute soon occurs, and all because Jack had been careless enough to break a cracker bowl. Betty is peeved and scolds Jack; the latter attempts to do likewise, and the better half quits the house in a huff.

Solitude becomes oppressive and Jack, too, seeks the open air and the noise of the streets.

Dick arrives at the end of his journey, and, finding no one at home, concludes to take Jack at his word and make himself at home. Placing the presents on the dressing table, he goes into the bathroom, takes a bath and then goes to bed.

Betty's risibilities cool off. She buys a cracker bowl and rushes home to make up with hubby. Dick's presents cause her some foolish heartaches, believing that Jack was buying things for another woman. Later she guesses Jack bought the presents for her only. Dear, thoughtful, loving Jack: How peacefully he sleeps! She warmly kisses the sleeping man, who alas! is not her Jack! Horror stricken, she runs into the parlor and straight into the outstretched arms of Jack, who has also brought home a cracker bowl as a peace offering.

Dick awakens at the strange salutation, bolts the door and hastily dons his clothes. Then the tangle is straightened out and everybody is happy.

On the same reel:

"SANTA FE" (Scenic).

A number of excellent views of this old and historic town are shown. We gaze with delight upon the "Capitol" dedicated 1900, replacing that destroyed by incendiaries in 1892; the Governor's Mansion, close by it; the "Palace of the Governors," built in 1605, which is the oldest executive building in North America. It has stood for 307 years and has witnessed the inaugural ceremonies of 101 governors, the latest being William C. McDonald. We also see San Miguel Church, believed to be the oldest church building in the United States, and still used for public worship. It was built in 1607 and renovated in recent years. The oldest house in America, built by Pueblo Indians long before Spanish occupation, is placed under our eyes and carries us to a forgotten age. The San Francisco Street, a lively thoroughfare, and a trio of burros, the beasts of burden, close this highly interesting picture.

"A PAIR OF JACKS"
Nestor Release, March 20

Jack Lewis and his wife, Helen, live on a ranch. She goes away on a short visit and he accompanies her to the station. No sooner has he waved her "good-bye" than he meets Jack King, an old school friend, who has arrived on the same train that Helen took. Jack King has brought his hunting dogs, etc., fully prepared for a fine hunting trip. Jack Lewis at once invites him to come to the ranch, pointing out where he can hunt, to his heart's content. Jack King gladly accepts.

Some days later Jack King receives a letter from his wife, Dora, telling him that she and the baby will surprise him soon with a visit. He is perplexed, but Jack Lewis tells his friend that they have plenty of room, and Helen may be back soon anyway. Jack King puts his wife and the baby's picture on the writing desk, leaves the letter on the table and hurries out to join his dogs.

Helen Lewis, a somewhat jealous and suspicious woman, not having heard from her husband as often as she expected, cuts short her visit and returns while both men are out. She finds both the picture and the letter, which, being addressed to "My dear Jack," makes her suppose that her husband has another wife and baby. Enraged, she rushes to her father's ranch, not far away. He snatches up his shotgun, and together they start for the Lewis ranch.

In the meanwhile, Dora King has arrived with the baby. Jack Lewis returns home first and invites her inside. He takes the baby while she goes into the bedroom, dons a kimono, takes down her hair and proceeds to make herself presentable to receive her husband upon his return from the hunting trip. The baby wants its bottle, and cries so vigorously that Jack Lewis is obliged to take it to its mother. As Dora is fixing the bottle and Jack Lewis is sitting on the bed with the baby, Helen Lewis and her father arrive, and see the couple through the window. Helen faints in her father's arms. Jack returns to the sitting room with the now quieted baby. Helen and her genitor enter and proceed to demand an explanation. On seeing Jack dancing the baby, they completely lose their heads. Dora, hearing the turmoil, believes them to be lunatics, snatches up her baby, runs back into the bedroom and slams the door in Helen's face. Helen pounds upon the door, her father menaces Jack with the gun, and Dora hurries to the window and calls for help. Jack King, returning home, hears his wife's voice and rushes to her aid. He arrives just in time to avert a tragedy. Explanations are speedily made; Helen is humiliated, but Dora readily forgives. The men shake hands and all is peace.

"THOU SHALT NOT (?)"
Champion Release, March 27

Here is a comedy that does not fail of its mission as a laugh producer, the situations being extremely funny and unique.

The reverend John Smith bids his wife good-bye to enjoy a much-needed vacation and goes away jubilant. On arriving at the railroad station he discovers that he has left his purse in his "other trousers" and returns home to get the wherewithal for his trip. In his absence Mrs. Smith has engaged a new maid who has locked the doors after Mrs. Smith has gone calling and promptly fallen asleep. The dominie finds the doors locked and is in a dilemma. Time is precious and he climbs in the window and proceeds to secure his purse. The maid awakens and sees the intruder whom she mistakes for a burglar. She raises an outcry and Smith is arrested, charged with robbery. In vain he protests and endeavors to explain but he is treated as a dangerous crook masquerading as a minister. His whiskers are pulled cruelly to test their genuineness. He is locked up with other prisoners and his lot is a hard one as he is jeered by his companions and subjected to ridicule.

The prison is visited by women bent on reform and to admonish the prisoners to obey the commandments, dwelling particularly on "Thou Shalt Not Steal." Smith sees the women and recognizes his wife and stealthily conveys the information to her that he is a prisoner and there is confusion. The minister is equal to the occasion and through the ingenuity of his wife manages to masquerade in his proper person as a minister who has visited the jail to commune with the criminals and exhort them to lead better lives. In this he is aided by the desk sergeant, who is made acquainted with the situation.

The scenes in the jail are ludicrous in the extreme and the story is entertainingly told.

THE VILLAGE IDIOT'S GRATITUDE
Gaumont Release, March 30

That the idiot is without some of the nobler sentiments and instincts of mankind is often fallaciously taken for granted by those who are not careful in their observations.

This film succeeds in disproving any such unjustifiable conclusion. In this case the Village Idiot forms an unusually strong and grateful attachment for a young peasant wife who disperses a tormenting band of children who were tauntingly following him. He follows her to the town pump and carries home her pail of water and later even rescues her young husband from a watery death and tows the boat carrying the fainting wife to safety. None others but the young peasantess however are able to thank him because of the fear and dread with which he impresses all his beholders. His fondness for his benefactress persists unto the very end.

CALINO AS MASON
Gaumont Release, April 2

Calino receives a contract to build a home after his own fashion. His ideas are notedly eccentric, so consequently the building. To begin with it is ominously unstable, which makes moving in particularly difficult. It is only accomplished after many a tumble of the family, moving men and furniture. Then too, the carpenter failed to nail down the floor-boards. The plumber did his work in perverted fashion. The gas-fitter allowed ample room for an explosion and even the gentlest of zephers proved too overwhelmingly strenuous for the rocking edifice. On the same reel is

AUNT AURORA

Uncle Adolph could be very, very happy with his two young, comely nieces, if they but made their eyes behave. Alas, the flirtations that they carried on whenever he relaxed in his vigil were such as proved a continuous source of annoyance. Things got so exasperating that poor Uncle Adolph began to look around for a female chaperon for the two jolly, though naughty girlies. One night the gentleman-oglers became so bold as to serenade the nieces much to Uncle's chagrin.

That was plenty. A chaperon must be engaged—but who? An ingenious moment suggested his sister-in-law, Aurora, whom he had not seen for more than twenty-five years. She was written to, and on she came. But what a surprise to Uncle Adolph—instead of securing the aid of a typical spinster for the office he found that he had brought a merry, yes, flirtatious relative into his midst. Of course the girls were never checked in their flirtations and Auntie even encouraged them in their amusement of this variety, with the result that Uncle Adolph, so deluged with relatives of this kind, was finally forced to change his views and give his sanction.

HIS DAUGHTER'S LOYALTY
Powers Release, March 26

After years of ceaseless toil upon his electrical contrivance the old inventor, Thomas Martin, is unable to make it run properly and is forced to give up in weariness and despair. It is then that his daughter Jane, who has kept closely in touch with her father's work, discovers the cause of the difficulty and starts the machine running. Joyfully bringing her father to witness the triumph of his work, both are horrified to discover that he has gone blind. In consequence of his affliction Jane is now forced to take up the battle of life for them both.

Jane goes first to the office of J. F. Ray, an electrical engineer and promoter, whom she interests in her father's invention. Besides the interest which he takes in the machine, Ray is filled with the greatest admiration for Jane, personally, and through his assistance medical aid is provided for her father. The specialist, after examining Martin's eyes states that there is hope of his recovering his eyesight, but that any sudden shock will be likely to kill him.

Ray also places the invention before a large electrical company who agree to give their answer regarding its manufacture in three weeks.

The three weeks elapse and Jane not hearing from Ray and believing he has forgotten her, consults another promoter named Gray. This man inspects the machine and at once realizes its wonderful merits. He, however, has no intention of paying for it and tells Jane and her father that it is absolutely useless and leaves them heartbroken. He then plans to steal the idea for his own benefit and returns later on and slips into the house, unobserved. Jane finally hears him, and although realizing the purpose of his visit and being overcome with fear, bravely represses her desire to call for assistance, knowing that a shock of this nature may cause her father to drop dead. Martin, however, hears the noise also and entering the room, impulsively tears the bandage from his eyes and discovers that he has regained his eyesight. Old as he is, he fearlessly grapples with the villain and a desperate struggle ensues.

At this juncture, Ray, who has closed the deal with the electrical company arrives with the necessary papers for Martin's signature. He, of course joins in the struggle and Gray is overpowered and ejected. Then all ends happily.

WHO'S WHO?
Powers Release, March 30

Dick Mallory tumbled into luck when he jumped off the same train at Oak Lane that his "double," Milton Scheuer, took for Chicago.

Dick had heretofore experienced very little good fortune, but when one of Milton's friends met him soon after his arrival and introduced him to the select social circle to which the wealthy Milton belonged he soon realized that he had stepped into another and worthier man's shoes and proceeded to play the game to the finish. Everywhere he was greeted as Milton and fell heir to Milton's sweetheart, Milton's bachelor apartments and valet, and even to Milton's would-be fiancee, Miss Cynthia Spreckles the spinster heiress.

Dick is not unmasked, as most impostors are in plays and stories, for he succeeds in winning for himself a blushing bride possessed of more than a comfortable income—her face not being her fortune. Upon Milton's return from Chicago, that clubman finds himself in the midst of a large hornet's nest and comes near losing his own little sweetheart. The climax of his troubles is reached when Dick has the audacity to confront him and accuse him of trying to impersonate himself.

FOR SALE—A LIFE
Thanhouser Release, March 26

A nervous, fault-finding invalid decides that his health requires that he shall live in the South, and manages to exchange his place "Up North" for a shack and an orange grove in Florida. Accompanied by his devoted wife, he sails for his new home, she hoping that he will regain his health and strength there.

On the boat trip the couple meet a wealthy young clubman, who is traveling for pleasure and to get away from the rigors of a New York winter. This man is impressed with the wife's grace and beauty, and for her sake puts up with the invalid, although he regards him as a selfish bore.

The husband plays cards with the clubman and a couple of his chums, also wealthy. He loses, but the others do not realize that the money, a trifling sum to them, is practically all that the couple have upon which to live. The invalid does not make any scene believing it to be "more manly" to prove he is a real sport, and then throw the burden of getting more money upon his patient, loyal and already overworked and overworried wife.

In Florida, the wife, who is an expert needle woman, obtains fancy sewing to do, and while delivering some work to a hotel guest again meets the clubman. He renews his acquaintance with the family, and the husband soon sees that the couple are in love. but does not object. He watches the situation with cynical amusement, and when he believes the time is ripe he approaches the clubman with a proposition that for the sum of $10,000 he, the husband, will get a divorce and go away. Then the way will be clear for the pair to wed.

The clubman at first listened to the suggestion with horror. He realized, however, that the woman's life with such a man as the invalid must be one long torment, and he decided to save her. So he agreed to pay the money, believing that thereby he would add to her happiness.

The wife came in while the deal was being discussed. She seized the shameful paper and tore it into bits then ordered the clubman out of her house, refusing to listen to his offered explanation. Hating her husband though she did, her woman's heart would not permit her to leave him, for she knew his days were numbered. When he died some time later, she was still ministering to him, and trying to make his last moments comfortable. He was crossgrained and selfish, but a ray of decent feeling animated his last moments, for he told his wife that the "Bargain" was a one-sided affair, that the clubman had never suggested it, the husband alone being to blame. He added that he believed the man truly loved her and simply tried to save her from a life of misery.

Many days after the funeral, the widow and the clubman met. At first she refused to talk to him, but gradually, as she thought of his many kindly ways, she relented, and they parted "friends." He did not press his advantage then but thought of the old adage, "Friendship is akin to love," smiled, and was content.

MY BABY'S VOICE
Thanhouser Release, March 29

Rose Scott is a stenographer in the office of a wealthy John Mackey and is wooed by a clerk there, one Merwin. But Mr. Mackey himself takes a fancy to her and she becomes Mrs. John Mackey. Ten years elapse and we find the Mackeys and their little daughter Ruth on a pleasure trip. Ruth makes friends with the hotel switchboard operator and to amuse herself uses the 'phone in her own room to talk to the little lady at the "board."

For the first time since the old office days, the Mackeys meet Merwin. Mackey finds his time very much occupied with his business projects. Mrs. Mackey, though, has time aplenty on her hands, time to renew the old friendship with Merwin. With Ruth they go walking through the city, for her husband is too busy with his affairs to do even that—even though he is on a "pleasure trip." So Merwin "fills in" nicely as an escort and makes himself very agreeable to the mother and daughter.

But Merwin's designs are not innocent. He tells the wife that he wants her to desert her husband. Instantly she spurns him, flees from him—she realizes that their friendship has been carried too far.

Then some evenings elapse, and putting her daughter to bed she goes to her husband to find he cannot stay with her even of nights—even then do business appointments call him. In a rush of anger, she decides to leave him, and she tells him everything in a note expressing her resentment of his neglect. She tells Merwin on the telephone that she will join him, and the girl at the switchboard happens to hear.

Immediately the "hello girl's" mind is made up. She will act in the wife's own best interests—swiftly. She pulls out the plug connecting the clerk's 'phone with that in the wife's room and switches the wife's line onto the 'phone in the little girl's room.

So instead of falling into Merwin's toils she hears the sweet, clear voice of her child saying: "Hello, mamma, did you want me?"

The baby's voice acts as cold water on her anger. She is shocked into reason, and rushes to the table on which lays the note—and tears the missive into bits.

In the meantime Merwin tries frantically to get the wife's room on the 'phone again. Finally he does succeed in getting an answer from the brainy hello girl, who says, "Sorry, but that line is busy." But Merwin sticks to his task and compels the operator to give him the line.

Little Miss Operator however, has won the great game for all that, for when the wife does talk to him she says, "I've changed my mind. I'll not go out this evening." Whereupon smiles are brought to the Angels—through the efforts of a mere little "hello girl."

THE ETERNAL MASCULINE

The attorney has been made guardian of a little country girl living alone in a New York state village whose uncle has left her an income of some $30,000 a year.

Jack, for his part, has found time during his absence from home to realize the many beautiful qualities of his little country girl and as Lucy had thought only a spark of jealousy was needed to bring to a flame her husband's love.

OPPORTUNITY
Majestic Release, March 26

John Renton, shivering from the cold, gripped his sister's hand and mutely pointed out a huge billboard. It announced in flaming type that Gouron, "The Violinist of the Century," fresh from his European triumphs, would favor New York with one recital that evening. Renton hugged his shabby violin case close to him and thought bitterly of his unhappy experience of trudging from theatre to theatre, restaurant to restaurant, repulsed everywhere in his search for a chance to make a few dollars even in the cheapest cafes. A shiver from his insufficiently clad sister brought him to himself, and affectionately patting her shoulder he sent her home, or rather to the wretched little room which served them as such, and hetook himself to a poor quarter of the town, and taking his violin from its case and nerving himself for the venture began to play. A few children gatbered about him idly curious. A few passershy paused occasionally and listened with unappreciative ears for a moment to music far beyond their comprehension.

In the course of an hour, a few pennies were bestowed upon him, when suddenly a representative of one of the "finest" briskly told him to move on. Shamed and disheartened, be crept toward home.

At the same time the St. Regis was the scene of great excitement welcoming Gouron, who in company with his manager, Ryler, the great impressario, was making ready to depart for his recital. Ryler was summoned ahead, however, and Gouron only accompanied by his valet, stepped into his taxi. Fate, the whimsical distributer of opportunity, saw fit to provide a drunken driver for the great Gouron, and in a squalid portion of the city the car came to an abrupt stop, and Gouron, ignorant of the city's geography, was forced to take his way on foot. Puzzled and dismayed he and his valet came to a pause before a tenement building. Suddenly Gouron quieted the valet's complaints with an imperative gesture, and turning into a doorway listened intently, for to his sensitive ear came the music of a great soul.

Forgetful of everything else, Gouron tiptoed his way toward the source of the exquisite barmony, and never stopping to knock quietly entered. The musician was Renton, poorly clad, terribly housed, he and his sister shivering from the cold, but their hearts warmed and thrilled hy the divine music of a genius.

Gouron was great enough to be above the petty jealousies of a lesser artist and impulsively becoming acquainted with the Rentons and their circumstances bethought him of a benevolent plan to provide the boy with his—opportunity. Gouron realized that not one person in the audience would probahly know him by sigbt, and his plan was nothing less than to have Renton give his recital.

A hurried change of clotbes was effected, and the bewildered boy and his awe-struck sister taken to the theatre where Gouron forced the unwilling Ryler to accede to his plan and Ryler in an agony of trepidation introduced Renton to the anxiously waiting audience as the great Gouron.

The recital fulfilled Gouron's expectations. Renton's triumph was immediate and terrific and Gouron himself at the close of the recital stepped upon tbe stage and taking the trembling boy's hand in his courageously told the audience of the deception he had practiced upon them in order that a genius might be presented to the world.

THE PRICE OF MONEY

Rex Release, March 21

The Rex Company wonders whetber you, Mr. Reader and his wife, know the real cost of money. The sins of omission and commission which are perpetrated in its yellow name, the mocking message and its leering lure, tbe frail futility of the bappiness it hrings, the shadows and the region of sighs to which its wide patb often leads, the weeping heart and the sleeping soul and the death of things that are right—these are often the price of money, these and the murder of peace and the grim burial of hope. "Money talks," but its remarks are often unpleasant.

When but a boy he had turned bis eager eyes to the wonderland westward, the land of opportunity and promise. So with a great resolve, a little money and much advice, he bade fond good-byes to the village folks and left his Germany, to sail across the old seas to the new home and the new hope.

Year after year glided hy, joining the phantom caravan of the dead ages; year after year the old villagers continued to forget the departed Hans, forget even the memory of his boyhood among them; year after year he accumulated the wealth that the new world so lavishly distributed, until one day, some nine years after he had first arrived in the fairy realms, the thought and the desire to return to the home land came to his mind, and his heart yearned for the old sights and signs and sounds.

To Germany he went, to the little town that had known him but knew bim no more; to the old hut of his old parents he came and —it was a balmy day and the earth laughed and life and the world were in happy mood, so Hans, in jocular vein, bit upon a joke; if his parents did not recognize bim he would ask for lodging as a stranger, and when the fun had lived several days be would disclose his real identity.

He was taken into his parents' bome, the stranger that was their son. To impress them, he took every opportunity that presented itself, and made others, to make his wealth apparent to his frugal elders—and be acbieved his purpose in too great a degree. The money that was intended to awe his parents hypnotized them. In all the days of their lives they had not had the gold which each day the stranger carelessly cast away. The yellow lure entered their hearts and the crimson thought came to their minds and the murder of covetousness owned their hands.

So one day Hans drank a glass of wine in which was that which robbed him of his life and his gold, and so it was that she who had in suffering given him his life in the joy of false wealth took it from him.

In detail to describe the power that stayed the murderous hand would require more than the line or two we have remaining. Suffice it to say that the secret of his identity became known to his parents, and Hans lived and loved in Germany.

THE STRENGTH OF THE WEAK

Rex Release, March 24

When Howard Velscy came from the medical school in the city bringing the proud trophy of the years of diligent study—his diploma—great was the praise and much the admiration of the old farm folks, but none was so proud and happy as his sweetheart Marion. To ber the sheet of paper bearing witness that her lover had completed his course and was eligible to practice in all its branches was an insignia of rare purport that placed its possessor among the big men and the intellectual giants of the world.

But soon after Howard's return, he departed again for the city, to use his learning for the afflicted and the suffering. And Marion wove dreams about her hero, dreams of many battles with death in which Howard was always the victor, dreams in which the people freed from the slavery of suffering blessed him and lauded his name.

So much for the sweet, poetic side of the simple girl's earnest love; now for the more prosaic metropolitan denouement of a country romance.

In the city Howard became assistant to a renowned and popular physician, and in his new duties and new professional life he forgot Marion, exactly as you must have prophesied. The women who came to see his chief were cultured, well dressed, "smart" and by comparison his little country sweetheart was—nix.

When the letters stopped coming, she wondered and worried, and determined to come to the city and seek her sweetheart. The mortar and steel of the city had gone into his heart—so he told her that he could no longer think of her that he had become too big and his work too important to give her any attention. So her heart broke a little—and she became a nurse.

And so we pilot you to the climax. A call came one day while the chief was out, making his presence imperative at a patient's bedside, and Howard volunteered his services. To his amazement, when he arrived at the home of the sick, he found Marion, who was there acting as nurse. The surprise of their meeting may have taken his mind off the patient and his malady, or it may just have been an inadequate knowledge of medicine, but he made a mistake in the prescription; and so a little later, when the nurse telephoned that their patient was dying, tbe doctor, fearing the consequences, refused to return to tbe sick chamber.

It was Marion who administered the antidote that saved the man's life; it was she who later again telephoned that tbe man was alive; and when his courage returned and he called it was she who refused his offer of marriage, now made in all sincerity and meekness, telling him that she had dedicated her life to the ill and afflicted forevermore.

OPPORTUNITY

(Majestic Release for March 26)

A beautiful subject indeed, and an elevating one, has been chosen for the Majestic release of Tuesday, March 26th. "Opportunity" is a wonderful story of generosity set in an atmosphere permeated by the spirit of music.

It is the story of a poor young violinist who lived with his sister in the most miserably poor quarters of New York. He trudged about from place to place hugging his violin, pulling his coat closer in attempts to keep out the bitter cold. But after all everything has an ending, and as the old song says, "Behind the cloud is the sun still shining," and the cloud was destined to break for

John Renton. One day there came a rent in its blackness and he beheld the light gathering around him. A great violinist, Gouron by name, was booked to play a certain evening in the great city; society awaited with eager anticipation the appearance of the wonderful musician. It happened on the eve of the performance that, owing to a drunken chauffeur on the taxi which was carrying Gouron and his valet to the theatre. The car came to an abrupt stop near the miserable home of the Rentons. John Renton happened to be playing at the time. As the strains of music floated out from the tenement Gouron stood spellbound, realizing by dint of the marvelous musical sense with which heaven had blessed him that he was now listening to the plaint of a great musical soul.

A generous thought came into the mind of Gouron, after he had mounted the stairs in search of the musician, and had found him in his wretched state. He would put him in his place to-night at the concert. No one knew him (Gouron) by sight here in the city and no one would be the wiser. Renton played, retiring amid excited applauding and a rain of bouquets. Gouron afterwards steps out on the stage and explains the ruse he has played on the audience. Needless to say Renton's opportunity had come, been grasped and his fortune was made.

It is a beautiful picture, beautifully staged and photographed.

Charles City, Iowa.—Fire destroyed the Lyric Theater.

Milwaukee, Wis.—Saxe Bros. have leased the property at Grand avenue between Fourth and Fifth streets and will erect a new theater.

AMERICAN PRODUCES SOME REMARKABLE INTERIORS

On Monday, April 1st, the American Film Mfg. Company, will release a remarkable picture entitled, "The Maid and the Man." Aside from the story itself, which is decidedly better than the ordinary, motion picture fans will be dumfounded at the remarkable interior settings the story contains. Instead of attempting to stage these wonderful interiors in the American's studio at La Mesa, it was decided to obtain permission from the management of the Hotel Del Coronado to stage all interior scenes in that famous hostelry.

The result is a bewildering array of settings whose equal have certainly never before been seen in motion pictures—for the reason that no manufacturer has or could obtain facilities for this production.

The first scenes are staged in and around the beautiful botanical gardens and grounds of the Del Coronado. Later they are shifted to the sun parlors, writing rooms, etc. Hence, the actual rooms of the famous Del Coronado will be shown just as thousands of tourists have seen them in real life.

THE MAJESTIC
IS THE PICTURE OF LIFE

MAJESTIC PICTURES are not exaggerated to please any one's fancy. They correctly portray the actual happenings in life. They are not overdrawn to the extent of being tiresome, but are interesting because of their moral or real heart interest.

When the time comes that the Exhibitor will tell his Exchange just what pictures he will use, the MAJESTIC will be there twice every week.

If the Exhibitor walks into his exchange and says "Please give me the Majestic," he may get them, but if he walks in, head up, and says, "Give me two Majestics, or I'll go where I can get them," he will get what he wants and needs.

We have no way of telling, of course, how many of the real owners of picture theatres go to the exchanges themselves in order to assure their patrons of good, clean, wholesome shows, but nevertheless it would be very interesting to know.

TWO FINE MAJESTICS

TUESDAY, March 19th, "Leap Year"—A timely farcical love story of complications, good story, beautiful settings and photography.

SUNDAY, March 24th, "The Eternal Masculine"—A comedy of sentiment—showing that it does not pay for a husband to be ashamed of his wife—clever in every particular.

TUESDAY, March 26th, "Opportunity"—A comedy of Bohemian life.

SUNDAY, March 31st, "The Lighted Candle"—A strong drama.

An Invitation to Dayton

Cincinnati, O., March 18, 1912.

Dear Sir:

In behalf of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, Ohio State League No. 1, I extend to all motion picture exhibitors a hearty invitation to come to Dayton, O., on the 26th and 27th of this month to participate in and enjoy the biggest convention ever held by our League. You will meet exhibitors from all over the United States and Canada. While this is only a state convention, hundreds of exhibitors are coming from other states to join hands with the Ohio exhibitors in making this a memorial gathering of motion picture exhibitors.

Every exhibitor will be made to feel at home. Special arrangements have been made to entertain the ladies. There will not be an idle minute—something doing all the time to entertain our visitors; the members of our League will take pleasure in making you enjoy yourself. Come and have the time of your life and see what is being done in the motion picture world for the exhibitors by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

Very truly yours,

M. A. NEFF,
President, M. P. E. L. of America.

OHIO CONVENTION AT DAYTON

To the Exhibitors of Ohio, Greeting:

We have watched with considerable interest the growing power of the National Exhibitors' League of America, and we trust the time is not far distant when every State in the Union will be allied to the mother league of Cincinnati, when every exhibitor in the land will be a member of a flourishing, nation-wide organization, banded together for his advantage and benefit. The time is ripe when a great forward movement should go ahead by leaps and bounds. It is becoming more and more necessary that keen leaders should rise and a strong council of administration, headed by the best legal talent it is possible to secure, to forestall some of the adverse legislation that is being thrust forward in the Senate or Houses of Assembly in the various States. Take the State of New York, which we handle in another editorial, as an example. Such legislation is being attempted in other States besides New York, and as the cinematograph industry is a growing educational movement, it should not be harassed by adverse legislation either in the matter of fire or Sunday blue laws, but all should be put on an equitable basis for progress.

A member of Canon Sheafe Chase's choir told the writer that while he is paid to sing in the choir, as soon as his services are over he, with his wife and daughter, immediately repairs ot a moving picture theatre nearby their home, and they obtain more real information and true knowledge of life than they do in church. We asked him why he did not resign his position. He said he would if he could get a position as chorister in the moving picture show. We don't quite like this attitude, which we consider very inconsistent, and told our informant so. He remarked that numbers of other choristers did the same as he did, thus showing the appealing influence of the moving picture show to educated men. Such is the testimony, gentlemen of Ohio and other States, that is being given by unbiased patrons of your theatres.

We are pleased to see that the standard of the exhibition of the theatre and of the film is getting higher, and we hope that you, by your influence, will raise the standard still higher and higher until you have eliminated anything of an objectionable nature upon your program. We are pleased to note that films that have been objected to by the Censor Boards of New York and Chicago are refused by your houses. You have a wonderful power in your hands for the advancement of a growing educational industry. The eyes of all the manufacturers, of your confreres in other States, are upon you to-day, and we trust that you will raise the standard so that others who are a little backward may follow in your lead. You have gone too far along the track to turn back at this time. The advancement made by you has been so great that you must still further advance, and, while a few of the weaker members may hold back a little, you are like the negro soldier who, when the standard-bearer was shot down in the Civil War, immediately raised the standard and went forward in the midst of the fight. The officer in charge of the detachment called out, "Man, bring the colors back." But the colored soldier in his enthusiasm pushed still further into the thickest of the battle, crying, "Bring the men up to the colors, not the colors back to the men," and this is the illustration I give to you to-day. Bring your men up to the advanced educational value of the moving picture, and not the moving picture back to the state it was two or three years ago.

To your officers, all well-tried men, men who have your interests and the interests of the industry at heart, give them your whole, full-hearted support, trust them and hold up their hands that they may help to still further advance your cause, give your loyal support and strengthen the hands of the national organization, which has been so ably officered and led by the national president, M. A. Neff, who seems to be indefatigable in his efforts to advance the cause of the National and incidentally your cause. He is only one man and can do nothing without the loyal support of his officers and the power of every individual man at the back of every league and every State association amalgamated with the National League. Much has been accomplished, much remains to be done, and, gentlemen of Ohio, also of the national organization, you can—you may if you dare—accomplish what the courts have not yet been able to do; that is given absolute freedom, in the land of the free, to the beautiful art of cinematography.

We, in our editorial capacity, have opposed no man or company individually, but we have opposed, on the principle of right and justice, the amalgamation of so-called patent interests to suppress the advancement of this art. We have opposed in the cause of freedom the corraling of an industry for the purpose of enriching a few men whose avaricious desires for unlimited wealth have overstepped the bounds of moral and legal right, whose sole god is Mammon, and who are working entirely against the freedom for which America is known. There is no country, the wide world over, where exhibitors and manufacturers of beautiful films are harassed and held back, where an industry is exploited, or tried to be exploited, for the few like in America, the land of the free.

Gentlemen of Ohio, where is this boasted freedom? where is the justness of the cause? We look to you to obtain an equalization of the rights which are justly your due, so that you may select your program from any and every manufacturer there is in this country or abroad, so that if you want a picture brought out by Rex, or Majestic, or Vitagraph, or Biograph, you may get it without any licensed or unlicensed demands. It is your right, it belongs to you. If there is anything in the words of freedom of America, demand it, ask for it, bring your Senators to bay and see that you get the freedom of selection that a free country should give you, otherwise you are worse than the serfdom of some European countries existing to-day.

CAPTAIN SCOTT AND THE ANTARCTIC ZONE IN THE UNITED STATES

Toward the close of last year, England, Germany, France, Spain and Portugal saw by means of picture the experiences of Captain Scott on his expedition toward the South Pole. These pictures were taken by H. C. Ponting, the famous British cinematographer who accompanied Captain Scott, R. N., on the Terra Nova from the day he left Wellington, New Zealand, the point of commencement, until February, when the expedition was comfortably encamped in their polar home across the great ice barrier at Cape Evans. These same pictures have now arrived in the United States and are being exploited on the state-right basis by the Gaumont Company.

The feature film market has long been acquainted with sensational melodramas and long drawn out three-reelers which could well have been condensed in a thousand feet of film. This time, however, heavy sensationalism and uninteresting vapidity have been misplaced by a topical timely subject. Every paper in all the civilized countries of the globe is just now contributing column after column to the subject of Captain Scott's discoveries.

The English publications at the time of the exploitation of the Captain Scott film the early part of this winter, expressed extreme interest in this subject and copious write-ups were contributed from all sources throughout the British Isle. Whether Captain Scott has actually discovered the Pole, and whether Amundsen has real justification to his claims is yet debatable, but the pictures of Captain Scott are above all the most unusual and realistic cinematographic views that have ever been offered the public.

Quite a number of states have been already sold on the strength of the first advertisement, inasmuch as state-right purchasers realize that the timeliness of this two-reel subject will carry much more weight and profit than the hackneyed three-reel melodramas that are being regularly released on the feature market.

Amongst the most superb of the views exhibited is the progress of the Terra Nova, Captain Scott's vessel, cutting her way through endless miles of ice, and the scrunching and pounding of the ice against her sides are so realistic as to convey the impression of being heard. By virtue of a special platform erected from the starboard of the vessel, together with a sharp incline of the camera, the most unusual views of the progress of the big Antarctic seafarer combating against the thickly forming and rapidly clogging ice has been made possible. Another unusual view grandly climactic in nature is the photographing of the Midnight Sun, something never before accomplished by a cinematographic camera.

Taking soundings, skinning penguins, disembarking Siberian ponies, ski-ing on the slopes of somber Mt. Erebus and the lonely peaks of Mt. Terror, sledging dogs, rounding up and sporting with the innumerable penguins, together with choice views of the great ice barrier, are amongst the stirring pictures offered, There are humorous incidents distributed throughout, such as the rolling in the snow of the ponies, delighted at the granting of their freedom from the ship.

For vividness, distinctness and realistic portrayal these pictures surpass anything of the kind seen so far, to quote the language of the Dublin Evening Herald. They are in a combined form both educational, geographical and historical. Furthermore, they are a complete and perfect record of the experiences of the greatest explorer of modern times. As before stated, the films comprise the journey from New Zealand to Cape Evans, the first station of Captain Scott and his crew.

SUNDAY SHOWS

WE wonder if the exhibitors in the State of New York are organized, or if they are in a position to repel attacks on their business at Albany. We have called attention so many times, in season and out of season, we might say, to the methods adopted by the religious people to suppress all kinds of exhibitions for the people, and return to the time of the Puritans when blue laws were well enforced. We wonder if the people today want to go back to those dark ages. If not, it behooves the exhibitors of the State of New York to immediately put their house in order, and organize, ORGANIZE, ORGANIZE. If this is not possible, get M. A. Neff to come down and speak to the Exhibitors' Association in New York and have a rousing good State organization immediately formed. Just to show our readers what is doing at Albany, we cull the following from the Reform Bulletin, a weekly report concerning moral reforms in the State of New York, published in Albany by the Rev. O. R. Miller, of the New York City League. It will be well for our readers to thoroughly digest the matter, and especially Clause No. 2, and if they are going to stand for such libels we think it is about time they got out of the business altogether.

Crusade Against Sunday Moving Pictures

Telegraph Your Senator and Assemblyman to Favor Senator Stilwell's Amended Sunday Moving Picture Bill

Senator Stilwell has amended his Sunday Moving Picture bill, as requested by the Social Service Committee of the Episcopal Diocese of Long Island and by the New York Civic League. This bill as amended forbids all Sunday vaudeville shows. It also forbids moving picture shows if an admission is charged, directly or by subterfuge. It omits the feature which punished the person or corporation supplying the gas or electricity for Sunday moving picture shows, as contained in his original bill. There are four reasons for favoring the passage of this bill:

1. The law now forbids moving pictures and vaudeville on Sunday as it does any tragedy, comedy, opera ballet and farce, but as moving pictures have been invented since the law was passed, there is a slight ground for the claims of some mayors and police officials that Sunday moving pictures are not forbidden by law.

2. Moving picture theatres have become, in many cases, the recruiting stations for houses of prostitution, which need much more careful supervision than is now given them on week days. They are especially dangerous on Sunday, when the children are idle and not in school. They have done much to deplete the Sunday schools.

3. Moving pictures, if given on Sunday, should be given by churches, Y. M. C. A. and public schools, without pay, for educational and religious purposes. If they are allowed to be given for personal profit, they are sure to fall to the standard which will attract those of the lowest morality.

4. Moving pictures are capable of being of the greatest educational value. But as they are not now effectively censored, they tend to corrupt the morals of youth. They are often immoral and suggestive, educating boys and girls in the details and methods of crime.

After thoroughly digesting the above, let them turn their attention to the following:

Resolutions Adopted at the Clerical Conference of New York City

March 11th, 1912. Rt. Rev. Frederick Courtney, Presiding

Whereas, Vaudeville and moving pictures for pay on Sunday are contrary to law as interpreted by ex-Corporation Counsel Pendleton;

Whereas, The moving pictures are not effectively censored, but contain pictures which tend to corrupt the morals of youth, and

Whereas, The moving picture shows are many times recruiting stations for houses of prostitution, and in accordance with a statement of an agent of the Children's Society, made in the morning World of March 11th, 1912, more than twenty men connected with moving picture shows have been arrested in the Borough of Brooklyn, charged with assaulting young girls within the last six months;

Whereas, The theatre workers at the Academy of Music on 14th street, Manhattan, who have struck because compelled to work illegally from 8 a. m. to midnight on Sunday, have appealed to the clergy of New York City to assist them in getting the Sunday laws enforced, saying that they have appealed in vain thus far to Mayor Gaynor;

Whereas, The vaudeville theatres and moving picture shows are permitted by the police to give "dramatic performances and exercises" and other exhibitions on Sunday clearly forbidden by the penal law and the city ordinances;

Therefore, Be it resolved that this conference ask for an interview with the Mayor to request him to use his power over the Police Department and over the Common Show License Bureau to revoke the licenses of all theatres breaking the Sunday law and to compel them to obey the law.

Resolved, In case the committee appointed to wait on the Mayor should not succeed in attaining its purpose, that the said committee be hereby authorized by this conference to send to all the Roman Catholic, Protestant and Jewish ministers of the city a full statement as to the nature of the Sunday laws, and the flagrant way in which violations thereof occur, indicating that such non-enforcement is unfair to those who conscientiously obey the law, and that it permits such a lax enforcement of all laws as to increase crime and bring all law into contempt.

Resolved further, In case the Mayor does not grant the relief for which we petition him, that this conference call the attention of the Grand Jury and of the District Attornies of New York, of Kings, of Queens and of Richmond Counties to the widespread failure to enforce the Sunday laws.

Residents of New York City: You can help this movement greatly if you will write Hon. William J. Gaynor, City Hall, and also ask the Men's League of your church to do so. Ask him to grant the request of the Conference of Clergy asking for the enforcement of the law forbidding Sunday shows.

Now, gentlemen of the cinematograph industry, what do you think of this? You must adopt the same tactics of the so-called moralists and organize strongly and determinedly. You must get after your Senators and your Assemblymen, and that right quick. You must be represented in the lobby and in the Senate unless you want to see your business entirely suppressed. We have repeatedly called attention to these Sundays laws, but it seems to us to be almost like a voice calling in the wilderness; the people do not seem to rouse themselves to the sense of their danger, and in a little while, if these bills pass, such a howl of indignation will go up, and then they will speak against them. What good is this? It is like locking the stable door after the horse is stolen. Now, gentlemen of the industry, lock the stable door and keep the horse in safe.

H_2O

Just water, that's all. It doesn't seem much, does it? but it stands for a great deal, and while the chemical equivalents above give us hydrogen two parts combined with oxygen, yet we gain what it is impossible for human life to do without. Shakespeare says, "Honest water, that never left a man in the mire," and if some of us would only stick to honest water there would not be so many failures in life as there are, because it is the dishonest water, the fire water, that does the mischief. Another quotation is, "Water, water everywhere and not a drop to drink." This, of course, refers to a shipwrecked mariner surrounded by water, yet parched with thirst owing to the salt of the sea. Going to the direct opposite of this, we take the words of another poet:

"Sink in despair, on the red parched earth,
And then you can reckon what water is worth."

So that whether on sea surrounded by water, or on the desert sands of Oriental countries, water is a sine qua non of human life.

What has all this to do with cinematography, you may ask? Well, just this: we do not know whether all our readers have sampled New York water, but if they have they have been up against a pretty hard problem to know whether it is clean water, or sewage, they are drinking. Sometimes it is as red with sand, or some other mineral, that almost repels one from the taking of it. What is the remedy? A good filter,—but how many homes possess one? Offices and home people, as a rule, have to pay heavy sums of money for drinking water which is practically, in many instances, Croton water filtered and sold at 25 cents a bottle. Then, again, photographers in every walk of life are hard pressed in the washing of their prints, their negatives and their films.

Making a call at a large supply house where they were developing amateur films, we were astonished at the sediment lying at the bottom of the tank. This is not conducive of good work in the way of general photography. How much more is it needed to gain clear water in cinematography where thousands upon thousands and still thousands of feet are washed with this water? Paying a visit to the plant of William N. Selig at Chicago, where the water is almost as bad, as far as the sediment is concerned, perhaps a little worse than New York, we saw installed there one of the finest filtering plants it is possible to put in. We were told this plant had cost an enormous sum of money, going into thousands of dollars, but we were informed the results more than paid for the vast outlay, and when the filter was opened for our inspection we saw very large deposits of sediment taken from the water. The Vitagraph Company at Brooklyn has also spent quite a little fortune on their filtering apparatus, and in conversation with them they also expressed their great satisfaction with the result obtained by this filtration. Five, six or even seven thousand dollars to install a filtering plant! Does it pay? the question may be asked. According to these two representative firms, yes. We have tried to get particulars from others of the manufacturers, and learn that they also have put in filtering plants, larger or smaller, doing work good, bad, or indifferent, according to the nature of the filtration. Would it not be wise for someone to come out with a good filtering apparatus at a reasonable cost for the trade, without the enormous cost charged at present, so that they can almost insure securing a water, clear and free from sediment or other material, and not only have their chemicals free and pure when in solution with this water, but also be a help to the employees, because, as we understand it, this water, after undergoing the process of filtration, is pure, clean and fit in every way for drinking purposes? It might be, if a reasonable price can be paid for a good system, that other industries allied to photography, such as the various photographic processes, lantern slide making, halftone work, would be assisted and strengthened by the use of cleaner water, free from granular and other deposits. If any of our readers know of such a plant or where it can be obtained at a reasonable cost, we would be extremely obliged to them to send us information for the good of the industry as a whole.

UNUSUAL DRAMA BY THANHOUSER

In "The Girl of the Grove," released Friday, April 5th, the Thanhouser players put over a dramatic story par excellence. It is a "Made-in-Florida" issue. There is not alone a strong story but very pretty settings. The story is of a girl who would end herself because she has found her sweetheart to be a married man. She is the grove girl. About to leap into the sea, she detects another woman in the same act, saves her, and takes her to her home in the orange grove. The woman explains that neglect on her husband's part drove her to the attempt at suicide. The girl learns the husband is the man who wooed her, and for whom she, too, intended taking her life. She finds comfort in the thought that no human life was sacrificed for so unworthy a being. The love she had for him goes to his abused wife. She expends it in finding comforts for the unfortunate woman. Flo La Badie plays the girl, Joseph Graybill the wooer, and Marguerite Snow his wife.

THE CHEF'S DOWNFALL

This is an amusing comedy in which J. R. Cumpson, Grace Lewis and Vivian Prescott find congenial roles. Mr. Cumpson poses as a count for the purpose of ensnaring Anna Travers, an heiress. The plot is succeeding most beautifully, when he is exposed through the jealousy of the cook, to whom he has formerly paid attention.

Just as the marriage between the bogus count and the beautiful society girl is about to take place, the cook appears on the scene and unmasks the chef, proving that he is not the count he is representing himself to be, but a fellow servant.

This is an amusing theme, and is bound to cause much merriment in any audience.

A CHANGE OF STRIPES

Imp Comedy, April 6, 1912

The stripes that are changed are those of an escaping convict. The man has by a series of miracles suddenly got away from prison. He has not had time to turn his newly-found liberty to account when an automobile appears. This thing has temporarily stopped and the owner has departed for more fuel. Enter Mr. Convict, who persuades the frightened woman left in the car to let him drive on to a place of safety. Then he turns her and the car adrift.

By accident, the owner of the car, suddenly appears before the escaping convict. The latter is a man of nerve and daring. Pointing a pistol at the head of the auto owner, he forces him to effect a change of stripes. In other words, he changes clothes with him. So the convict becomes garbed in civilian attire, has money, keys, and some visiting cards in his pocket, whilst the innocent auto owner is made to look like a convict. Of course, the plot develops along fairly obvious lines.

A reward is offered for the escaped convict and the man in the stripes is at first mistaken for the fugitive until he explains matters satisfactorily.

Meanwhile, the convict elated with his new-found liberty makes for the auto owner's home and is about to depart with some of the plunder of that pretty residence, when the auto owner catches him and delivers him up to justice.

The important role in this comedy falls upon Harry Pollard as the escaping convict. It is a comedy set amidst California scenery, showing the adventures which may befall a young couple out for an innocent day's automobile recreation.

AMERICAN ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN IS FELT AMONG EXCHANGES AND EXHIBITORS

The American Film Mfg. Company, which is right now in the midst of a giant advertising campaign, is beginning to receive many complimentary letters from theatres and exchanges reflecting much satisfaction at the excellent results attending the American's big campaign.

At the present time about eighty representative American newspapers, both large and small and scattered all over America, are carrying American film stories in page and half-page size. These stories are run under the unique caption of "A Photo-Play in Story Form." It is a new method of handling the short story and editors were not slow to see its possibilities from their own standpoint.

Such a campaign, carried on in so large a way, cannot help but benefit the entire motion picture business. It stimulates interest in motion pictures generally, creates a public desire to see them and thus benefits the entire industry.

The American has shown much commendable spirit in thus placing its pictures before the public some weeks in advance of release date. The reader, some weeks later, having read the story, is doubly interested in the pictures themselves.

THRILLING RESCUE IN THE WATER

One of the strongest scenes ever witnessed in moving pictures is employed in the portrayal of the water scene in "The Mysteries of Souls," the big three-reel production for distribution by the Great Northern Special Feature Film Co. It is a thrilling rescue performed in the water, and a drowning woman is snatched from the jaws of death at a most opportune moment by a strong swimmer. The heroine of the story is taken out rowing by two villains, who have conspired to bring about her death to remove the only obstacle in their path that stands in the way of a fortune. The girl cannot swim and the boat is intentionally sunk, and she struggles in the water powerless. She is seen to sink down in the filmy water and then rise again, only to go down strangling to what seems imminent death. One of the scoundrels conceives the idea of saving her in order to extort money from his accomplice and he dives into the water just as she is sinking for the last time. The result is graphic in the extreme, and is one of the most difficult feats ever attempted by a moving picture camera. There is no deception employed, as every movement of the actors in the water is plainly discerned. The heroine takes a desperate chance to bring about the effect and is truly a plucky actress. As the incident illustrates one of the important situations of the story, it is rendered doubly interesting. This is only one of the many sensational scenes in this great drama.

ATTRACTS SOCIOLOGICAL STUDENTS

Some prominent New York students of sociology were permitted by Thanhouser Co. to visit their studio last week during the filming of the Elizabeth Barrett Browning poem, "The Cry of the Children." This is considered by many the greatest child labor epic ever written. It is suggested that exhibitors showing this film make capital of it by inviting leading sociological students in their localities to see it, and getting it before the friends of social uplift generally. The picture is in two reels, released Tuesday, April 30, and because of its nature is expected to "make a noise" in all parts of the country.

NEW EXHIBITORS STARTING RIGHT WITH HALLBERG ECONOMIZERS

Among the new equipments furnished this week by J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," the following are mentioned as those who have wisely decided to purchase the best without regard to price, where current controlling devices are concerned: Orpheum Theatre, Lexington, Ky., one Hallberg 35 amp. D. C. Economizer, 110 volts; Bathgate Theatre, The Bronx, New York City, Hallberg Standard A. C. Economizer; G. L. Babcock, Plainfield, N. J., Hallberg Regular A. C. Economizer. Mr. Hallberg reports a brisk demand for moving picture machines, opera chairs, and other equipment for moving picture theatres.

APPEARANCE OF BERNHARDT AND REJANE MILESTONE IN EVOLUTION OF MOVING PICTURE

The appearance of these two great actresses before the motion picture camera has unlocked a door to posterity, which might have been forever closed but for this great invention. Bernhardt must live forever in the history of the drama as its greatest interpreter, just as Shakespeare stands alone as history's greatest playwright.

That the immortality of the "Divine Sarah" has now been made an accomplished fact is due to the persuasions of the Film d'Art Company, of Paris, parent company of the well known American firm known as the French-American Film Company, who have exclusive control of the North American rights to the Bernhardt and Rejane films.

Rumor, for which there are excellent foundations, tells us that almost all the State rights for these films have been sold. The success of the selling campaign of the Bernhardt and Rejane films, which, by the way, are the greatest sellers that the film world has yet known, is doubtless due in a very large measure to the energetic efforts of that clever young press agent, Mr. Walter J. Kingsley, whose remarkable capabilities are so well known in press and theatrical circles.

It seems only just and right that we should pause a moment in our praises of the great Bernhardt and her contemporary Rejane to place a sprig of laurel on the brow of one of the most convincing and versatile press representatives and advertising managers in America to-day.

Mr. Walter J. Kingsley, who is at present, as above mentioned, taking care of the publicity end of the French-American Film Company and also personal press representative for the Countess of Warwick, is a newspaper man of long experience having been abroad as a special correspondent covering the Boer War for the London Daily Express and the Russo-Japanese War for the London Daily Mail. He was for several years a London correspondent. In the United States he held every position on a newspaper from cub reporter to managing editor. For over a year he was editor of the Yokohama Daily Advertiser.

As a press agent he has handled Bernhardt, Forbes Robertson, Geo. M. Cohan, Raymond Hitchcock, went around the world with M. B. Leavitt, and has been the general representative of several of the biggest theatrical firms. Also handled the press campaign of the Folies Bergeres Music Hall and Restaurant. He was press agent for the Japanese Government during the events leading up to the war with Russia.

Mr. Kingsley's experience and acquaintance is world wide; he is at home anywhere they publish newspapers or have theatres. Motion pictures appeal to him as the best field for advertising enterprise, hence his acceptance of an executive position with the French-American Film Company.

The following short synopsis of the famous play in which Bernhardt has become immortal, and which has been prepared by Mr. Kingsley, gives some idea of the splendid style of his work.

CAMILLE

The Play by Alexander Dumas, Fils

Both the novel and play form the success of "Camille" or "La Dame aux Camelias," by Alexander Dumas, the younger, has been world-wide and perennial. The popularity of the story increases with the years.

"Camille" is no fantastic romance; it is a cross section of life; a human document; the true story of a lovely, loving woman who lived, who adored and who died. Marguerite Gauthier was not an imaginary person. In life she was Maria Duplessis and in 1845 she was the reigning beauty of Paris and the toast of all the clubs. She was remarkable for her exquisite luxury, her dazzling beauty and a certain nobility of character combined with natural distinction. Her manner was natural; she bore an air of innocence and no grande dame was more the great lady than she.

She led the agitated life of the courtesan without joying in its successes. Falling into consumption she despaired and let herself drift with the whirlwind of fast life in Paris. At a gay ball her friend and neighbor Prudence, introduces her to Armand Duval She meets him with indifference but he falls madly in love and observes with pain the evident sufferings of the fair young woman of the world. A little later she faints in the dance and it is Armand who aids her and reveals the unmistakable signs of true sorrow and love. Marguerite is not used to such tender affection and is drawn to Armand. They fall deeply in love and lose no opportunity to be together. One day Marguerite asks Armand to leave as she is tired and needs some rest. All unsuspecting he goes away but as he passes out he sees the Count of Giray enter. Mad with jealousy he goes to Prudence and charges her to give Marguerite a letter in which he expresses his regrets that he is not a millionaire and announces his intention of leaving Paris without seeing her again. Prudence gives this letter to Marguerite at the moment that she has received a check from the Count to pay her heavy debts and leave her free; she bursts into tears and is prostrated. Armand hearing of her profound sorrow goes to her and begging pardon for his letter assures her of his love. They arrange to leave Paris together and to live in the country in happiness. Unfortunately M. Duval, father of Armand, receives a letter from the father of his son's fiancée stating that the marriage cannot take place until Armand has cast off Marguerite. To protect the happiness of the children M. Duval goes to Marguerite and stating the situation begs her to give up Armand. A powerful scene follows and Marguerite only consents when she is convinced that an innocent girl's heart will be broken if Armand remains with her. Accordingly in a storm of tears she writes a letter to Armand informing him that all is over between them and that she is about to leave Paris as the mistress of Count de Varville. She places the letter on the table for mailing and leaves the room. Armand arrives ready to depart for the country. He sees the letter and reading it is overcome. His father, who has seen his arrival, enters in time to catch his son in his arms and take him home. Months later Armand sees Marguerite enter a ballroom on the arm of the Count. He gambles and wins heavily. Excited and reckless he goes to Marguerite and reproaches her. As she makes a piteous rejoinder he takes the banknotes he had just won from his pocket and before everyone throws them in her face at the same time expressing his contempt for the woman whom he thinks mercenary. A duel follows between Armand and the Count. Marguerite returns to her home and broken by the stress of emotion takes to her bed to die. Armand's father hearing of the duel and what prompted it is filled with admiration for Marguerite's loyalty to her promise. He writes to her expressing his sorrow and he tells his son the true story of the affair. Armand rushes to her and finds her dying. Then follows the wonderful death-bed scene in which Bernhardt reveals herself as the divinity of tragedy. Great scenes crowd close upon each other in "Camille" and the action is completely self explanatory.

The perfect mistress of the art of the theatre Bernhardt at once understood the especial needs of the motion picture play and conformed to those requirements which make projections like a joy forever.

THE PASSING OF THE GHOST

By Margaret I. MacDonald

DOWN the corridors of moving picture halls there flits a ghostly figure, retreating rapidly in the distance, blown hither and thither against the grimy walls hung thick with cobwebs, by the fresh clean breezes of the bright, sun-filled atmosphere of a new industry.

This figure has a pale, repulsive face, its matted tresses hang like a dirty fringe over bleary eyes, and its skirts are stained with the filth of the cesspools through which it has passed.

Does it sound too bad? Against the comparison of the beautiful daylight into which its child has crept it is a gloomy figure fit only for the back yards of memory.

It is a delight and a privilege to contemplate the industry after its sojourn of years in the dark, an outcast of society, with the bright and shining face which it presents to the public gaze of to-day.

Rescued by scientists, educators, philanthropists, and the world of art as a vehicle of marvelous capacity, whose facility and remarkable exploiting capabilities commend it to both the to-day and to-morrow of civilization, it stands out like a beautiful statue emblematic of knowledge.

Such remarkable dimensions has the moving picture industry of to-day taken that the survival of only the fittest is assured. Such a grasp has the intelligent public taken of its capabilities for usefulness in the uplift movement of the day that the incredulity of the few must needs vanish in short space as the great educator continues to be put to new and valuable uses.

From the standpoint of art the improvements which we see developing like magic before our eyes are an absolute inspiration to even the most inartistic observer. Such masterpieces of motion picture photography as "The Margrave's Daughter," recently produced by the Gaumont Company, of Paris; the "Notre Dame de Paris," of Pathe; "The Violin Makers of Nuremburg," of Solax; the "Oedipus Rex," of Kinemacolor; the "She," of Thanhouser, and other equally worthy productions of the various moving picture concerns throughout the world, present to us the larger possibilities of the moving picture in the exploitation of drama and art.

The scenic and spectacular effects which have been produced in some of the present day productions are such as ten years ago could not even have been dreamed about. The advantage of education afforded the present generation is as yet beyond the realization of the masses except as a matter of cheap entertainment. It means, nevertheless, the making of a new civilization, the building of a new humanity, and the facilitation of the absorption of knowledge and understanding.

THE DETECTIVE'S DOG

(Solax)

CAST

James Harper, a Secret Service detective....Darwin Karr
Mary Harper, his wife.....Blanche Cornwall
Kitty, their child.....Magda Foy
"Jack" the dog....."Lewis Solax"
Richard Toole, chief of counterfeiting gang....Lee Beggs
Police, Counterfeiters and Storekeepers

Vividly and picturesquely is this story told of the consequences following a bit of kindness to a dumb animal. The interest centers about the dog that follows the scent of his master and finally finds him bound on a movable iron slab with an automatic circular-saw attachment. A clock arrangement clicks the time when the detective, who has been on the trail of desperate counterfeiters, will be sawed in two. The picture is alive with melodramatic thrills and wonderful mechanical and scenic contrivances and situations.

The story deals with the good results which follow a bit of kindness to a dumb animal.

Kitty, the six-year-old daughter of Detective Harper, finds a homeless dog. Her mother does not look with favor upon the animal, and is about to drive him away when Harper decides that they will keep the dog.

A gang of counterfeiters victimize some storekeepers with bad bills. The storekeepers complain to Captain Matthews of the Police Department, and he in turn notifies Detective Harper by telephone.

He traces the gang to their headquarters in the suburbs, and as he is about to enter the house, they discover the detective. The chief enters the house and notifies his accomplices who are at work printing bad money. They plan to capture the detective, and lay a trap for him. He falls into it and they bind him in a basement chamber on a slab with an automatic circular saw attachment.

In the meantime, Mrs. Harper, on the second day of her husband's absence, worries, and the child Kitty suggests that the dog, Jack, be sent to search for him. Mrs. Harper is taken with the idea and gives the dog an old coat of the detective's to scent. The dog dashes off to find the detective, locating him finally in the underground chamber, and crawling through a grated window to reach him, gnaws the rope that binds the man. The detective telephones for the police and the criminals are arrested. The dog has proved his gratitude for the kind action, and earns the gratitude of the whole family.

The "secret" divulged on this page some weeks ago to the effect that cinematography was to be utilized in the coming political campaign, seemed to attract wide attention and the press in various sections of the country has freely commented upon the article. In alluding to the news article the St. Louis Globe-Democrat editorially presents the following:

"If kept free from clap-trap the film shows can make a hit this year in national affairs. This is a big country, with territory nearly half way around the world. It covers many climates and races, with the American type highly predominant. Why not cultivate motion pictures in which the intelligent advancement of all the people is the aim? We have troops on police duty in China. Not much is known of our more than 3,000 islands in the Philippine group. Hawaii is a region of pictorial interest, and so are Porto Rico and Guantanamo. The over-sea railroad to Key West is unique. Irrigation projects and the Panama Canal always invite the camera. The Mexican border is a stirring place. Current events are an inexhaustible subject for illustration.

"Scurrying cowboys and dime novel sentimentalism have had more than a fair share of attention in picture shows. As for the scenes of political significance it will be necessary, if audiences are to be pleased, to steer clear of buncombe of demagogues. The United States is an infinitely bigger proposition than any man is or can ever be unless its form of government undergoes a fatal change. So if politics is to be introduced on the screens let it be in views that accord with the greatness of the people, their sovereign powers, and their country.

A motion picture that is intended to drive the toothache out of the civilized world is in the course of preparation. Plans for the film were considered at a meeting of the Educational and Oral Hygiene Committees of Dental Associations held last week. Duplicates of the film will be sent to all countries and will be exhibited by societies, governments and municipalities. The pictures will show all conditions of tooth disease and decay. They will show how people can prevent toothache and preserve teeth. The dentist will figure to a very small extent in the picture, as the film is not intended to boost the dentists' business. The film is planned to be a free offering from the dental profession to humanity.

Here is another angle to the educational end of cinematography. Every dentist has a pull and the pictures should abound with true heart throbs.

Lives there a man with soul as dead as drouth-killed prairie grass,
Who would not let his business slide to use a picture pass?

The enterprising Mayor and President of the Chamber of Commerce of Schenectady, N. Y., are negotiating with a moving picture film manufacturer to illustrate the public works and show places of that city and flash them upon the screens in theatres in various parts of the country. Several cities are already advertised by means of moving picture shows at no cost to the cities, and with profit to the owners of the nickelodeons.

Water front activities, including the operation of coal and ore loading, the holiday crowds in public parks, the zoo, the fire department, interior views of great industrial concerns, and a thousand other phases of human interest and activity, are to be found in many cities. And the pictures would be fully as animated, certainly as attractive and immeasureably more educational than many produced at greater cost of time, effort and cash.

The suggestion is free to city officials everywhere. Civic bodies now advertising the worth of their communities in magazines and newspapers might well study the advantages of cinematography advertising which is inexpensive considering the great benefit derived.

While pounding the typewriter keys incident to writing the item above, we inadvertently used the word "Nickelodeon." Pardon, please. Hereafter that word, and the term "nickle theatre" are taboo on this page. With the growing importance of the moving picture, dignity is added to the picture theatre. Allusions to such places of amusement as "Nickelodeon" and "Five-cent Shows" is inapropos. The moving picture theatre is now a formidable rival to the standard theatre. The sooner cheapening allusions to the picture industry are excluded, the more quickly will these popular picture theatres derive the prestige and dignity that is rightfully theirs.

A news dispatch says that grand opera in Boston is on the wane because public preference is for the motion picture screen. Now that the effete Bostonian has acknowledged the class of cinematography, we of commoner clay can indulge our partiality for the pictures fearless of "refined" criticism.

The growth and strength of our nation depends upon the development of the boy. The boy problem has received the careful study of the best minds. A number of boys' societies and associations have been organized. The National Cash Register Company, the world-famous concern at Dayton, Ohio, to protect its property and to train boys who might become N. C. R. workmen, solved the problem by starting Boys' Gardens, which have become noted throughout the world. The boys were furnished with plots of ground, seed, tools and an expert gardener placed in charge of them. They were required to devote a certain time each day to their gardens at the expense of the company. The boys formed themselves into a self-governing body. The work of these boys and the results attained by them has become a feature of a kinemacolor film that is being exhibited free of charge by flower and garden clubs and civic bodies throughout the West. The pictures are doing a great work. This is the class of film that certainly counts in the educational world and it should be exhibited in every school room, great and small in the United States. We need more of this class of pictures.

If A. L. Erlanger's opinion is to be accepted—and he is one of the best informed students of amusements in America—then the day of moving picture dramas at one and two dollars, is not far distant. Erlanger is quoted as follows:

"The moving picture show is destined to become in the very near future a greater factor than it is at present. Theatres have suffered somewhat from the rivalry of the moving picture shows, but we find there is still a public to patronize good plays. The moving picture business is still in its infancy. No one can predict the extent of its development within the next few years. Many expert men are at work in their endeavor to perfect improvements and the result of their work is constantly evident. I believe the day of the high-priced moving picture entertainment is not far distant."

Mr. Al Lichtman, traveling representative of the Powers Motion Picture Company, has just returned, after a most successful five weeks' tour of the United States and Canada, having exhibited, with the most gratifying results, the Powers' new productions to the various exchanges and exhibitors.

THE SEWER

(Solax)

The Two-Reel Spectacular Melodrama—Big Scenic Production and Remarkable Light Effects and Picturesque Incidents—Thrilling Story

For four weeks the scenic artist and the Solax property men worked on the light and mechanical effects for this two-reel feature release of Wednesday, April 24th. As a result of this long studied and careful preparation, the Solax Company is able to say to the exchanges and exhibitors that it now has one of the most vivid and most remarkable melodramas produced in pictures. Every foot of the film brings a new thrill. In the long weeks of preparation, real sewers, manholes, rats, traps, switches, pulleys, dives and dens, mannikins and other contraptions used in the underworld, were gotten together with utmost care and attention to detail.

The story of the sewer was written by Henri Menessier, of Beaux Arts. M. Menessier is at present at the head of the Solax art department. He spent considerable time at the head of a gang of workmen and directed them in the building of a big ditch in the Solax grounds in Flushing. This ditch was eventually filled with water and real sewage waste. He contrived an ingenious roof and wall for this sewer which shut out considerable light and yet was light enough for photographic purposes. The sewer rats which attack the hero were a week in taming and training. White rats were used, as it was found that the ordinary gray rats were not amenable to reason. They would scamper as soon as let loose. In order that the white rats would look like gray sewer rats, it was necessary to paint them red, so that they would photograph black.

The studio door was sawed up and a trap-door was built. A big hole was dug under the trap, so that the hero, who is lowered down by rope and pulley, would give the effect of being swallowed by the earth. In fact, all the effects aimed for registered with exactitude on the film.

DEATH OF PAUL ALEXANDER

Washington, D. C.

The death of Paul Alexander, perhaps our best known and most artistic painter of lobby signs for the motion picture plays, on March 11th, has robbed those amusement houses of one of its best friends. Not only was he the typical "fine fellow," generous, congenial, and accommodating in business, but to him belongs a good share in raising the standard of the moving picture industry by making the lobby displays more attractive and less sensational, and thereby inviting the more cultured element to the show. It should be known that the moving picture men of Washington expend much money on artistic hand posters, some of the houses discarding the glaring lithographs of the manufacturers all together. Mr. Alexander, J. Boyd Dexter and a few others are responsible for this condition. Mr. Alexander was known as a "lightening artist," creating a figure or a flying locomotive in an incredibly short time. He was ever introducing some fancy lettering and was the originator here of the Binger style of letters, with a speed of 1,000 in three minutes.

Mr. Alexander's work was by no means confined to motion picture houses, for he had a large trade of more artistic signs and cards for theatrical attractions. He had many personal acquaintances in the stage profession, having painted in oil several theatrical stars. His was not a profession gained in a careless manner, but through the exacting course of the Beaux Arts of Paris. His studio in Washington, while presenting something of the usual appearance on entering of the ordinary sign painter, was hung with many works of art from his own brush, and a visit in leisure moments brought forth hidden treasures of much value. He was happy to discuss his travels and especially did he enjoy talking of Paris.

The death of Mr. Alexander was exceedingly sudden. Apparently in good health, with an insignificant indigestion, he was laughing and jesting with William Airey, manager of the Alhambra, and some other friends at midday, and at 3 o'clock in the afternoon he was dead from a stroke of paralysis. He leaves a wife who was always his congenial helpmate. The Alexander studio here is expected to continue with able assistants. W. H.

AMERICAN PRODUCES SOME REMARKABLE INTERIORS

On Monday, April 1, the American Film Mfg. Co. will release a remarkable picture entitled "The Maid and the Man." Aside from the story itself, which is decidedly better than the ordinary, motion-picture fans will be dumbfounded at the remarkable interior settings the story contains. Instead of attempting to stage these wonderful interiors in the American's studio at La Mesa, it was decided to obtain permission from the management of the Hotel Del Coronado to stage all interior scenes in that famous hostelry.

The result is a bewildering array of settings whose equal have certainly never before been seen in motion pictures—for the reason that no manufacturer has or could obtain facilities for their production.

The first scenes are staged in and around the beautiful botanical gardens and grounds of the Del Coronado. Later they are shifted to the sun parlors, writing rooms, etc. Hence, the actual rooms of the famous Del Coronado will be shown just as thousands of tourists have seen them in real life.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

Hats Off to Eclair

Mr. H. Rush Raver, manager Eclair Film Company, writes us a reminder which should be carefully read by all scenario writers. His statement follows: "I desire to remind you that the Eclair Company publishes the names of scenario writers, not only in connection with synopses in its own house organ, 'The Bulletin,' but on its posters as well.

"I doubt if any other firm in America attaches the author's name to the latter.

"The author's name will also appear on the film itself, as it has in the past, except in cases where it was found necessary to reconstruct a scenario almost entirely. In such cases we maintain a silent attitude.

"Look at an Eclair poster of recent date and you will find three out of four carrying a separate panel portrait of the star player in the picture, as well as the name of the scenario author."

We have looked at recent Eclair posters and mighty attractive are they. The more so because the majority of them carry the name of the author of the playlet in bold-faced letters right under the title. Not the scenario author's name in small type in some obscure corner, but, mind you, where everyone can read it. Hats off to Eclair. Like Edison, the Eclair Company will profit thereby, in getting first readings of the first-class, original work.

More Truth Than Poetry

There is more truth than poetry in a communication we have received. The writer of the communication is an authority, and several of those energetic authors so anxious for the organization of a "Scenario Writers' Association" may well read and ponder. Here is the letter in its entirety:

"I take exceptions to statements that authors of scenarios should receive full credit. In probably one per cent. of the cases this would be just. In the other 99 per cent. of the cases it would be giving an individual credit for something that he did not do and would foist him into the moving picture industry as a full-fledged constructing scenario writer, when in reality, he is nothing more than a 'suggestor,' or idea-furnisher.

"What of the hard-worked scenario builder—whether editor or director, it matters not—who takes probably more time in revamping a vague idea than the original author required in writing, typewriting and mailing it?

"Now take the average script with its twelve to twenty scenes and then that same scenario ready for production; its 'working script' cut up into scenes ranging from thirty-five to seventy-five, including flashes, break scenes, inserts and cut-backs. See a motive for an action changed completely around from one extreme to another, from bad to good or vice versa. See a character changed from male to female, from clergyman to gambler. Read the original story and then see the picture and then ask yourself to whom belongs the credit.

"Not one scenario writer in one hundred can furnish a marketable working script, and in that lies the true art of scenario writing."

Some Reflections

The above forceful assertions put a somewhat different light on agitations that have been going the rounds. It comes direct from "headquarters" and, reading between the lines, it can be suspected just why it is that prices for scripts rarely exceed the $25 mark. Of course, the editorial staff has been trained in technique and the author, far from the center of things, must struggle along and learn by experience. However, with a closer study of the picture plays shown in every community, more careful consistent work, and more originality, we believe that the labors of the editor in rewriting scenarios will become lessened and that prices will advance. Personally we would like to see something like the following on every film: "Scenario by James Johnson;" "Adapted by (editor's name);" "Staged by (director's name)." This procedure would satisfy the original author and give deserved credit to the editor and director.

What Essanay Is Doing

The editor of the Essanay Company has issued a form letter to some contributors, which says that the company will not solicit any more scenarios for several months because of a very large stock on hand.

You Are Mistaken

After commending Edison and other companies on steps they have taken in recognition of meritorious scripts, a Morristown, N. J., author writes us as follows: "I sometimes think when good plots are submitted to large producers and returned as not being available, that they must patronize the work of favored authors, rather than give each scenario submitted, careful and unprejudiced consideration."

There goes the old war cry once again. How often must it be repeated that the favored writer is the author who can submit scripts that should receive favorable consideration? Every worthy script is given "careful and unprejudiced consideration." It makes no difference whether you live on Fifth avenue, New York, or Oskosh, Wis., if you have the goods worthy of presentation, they will be carefully examined. Forget it, Morristown, and turn out good, original stuff. Good workable plots are always available.

Questions Answered

G. H., Brooklyn, N. Y., wishes us to make this department permanent, which we agree to do if authors will come on in and aid in making the page one of mutual benefit. Anent synopsis subjects, there is no concern that will pay as much for a bare idea in synopsis form as a detailed scenario. You may get $25 for a good scenario and $5 for a synopsis giving the same idea but undeveloped. Do not be discouraged. There is no author drawing breath of life who ever sold every one of his scripts. They all have drawn rejection slips.

A Line From Mr. Battley

Mr. Lee Percival Battley, of Washington, D. C., intimates that authors furnish the originality and permit the editors to furnish the technique. The writer joins a host of others in giving thanks to Editors Giles R. Warren and H. G. Plimpton for encouragement. He proposes to keep right at work turning out scripts, and sends along word to brother scenario writers that they will receive their reward, that it is surely coming, little by little. Mr. Battley asserts that originality is the cream of success. He compliments Bison's two-reel stories. "My greatest drawback is in not possessing a typewriter," writes Mr. Battley. He speaks the gospel truth.

Cincinnati is informed that C. B. Hoadley has resigned as scenario editor of the Champion Company and has joined the Great Northern as press agent. He is not reading scripts. It is useless to send them to him.

PERMANENCY

Has the picture come to stay?

This question has been asked seriously many times by men who are investing their money or are contributing their work in one way or another.

Probably it will be asked many times more. Nor is the answer easy. It may be that the present rush to see pictures, the present desire to be among those who help with their dimes and nickels, is only a passing fad and that the end will come shortly. It is scarcely possible to say with certainty, still there are features which seem to point almost conclusively to permanency. It would seem impossible that a thing which is so amusing and so helpful in various ways should disappear, or even lose any considerable proportion of its influence.

Of course it will be admitted that there will always be those who will seek to prostitute anything with which they come in contact to their own selfish ends, and in that degree, perhaps, the pictures will fail of accomplishing as much as they might The situation is in the hands of the producers, and happily they are almost unanimous in the desire to maintain a very high standard, not only in pictorial quality, but morally and otherwise. With such a view of their responsibilities there can no longer be any question of the best possible being done to hold the pictures up to the highest modern standard.

The whole question of permanency depends upon this one thing. If the picture is made as good as it can be, if the author, the producer and the photographer combine with the actor to create pictures which will be interesting and convey an uplift at the same time—in other words, will contribute toward the inspiration which is so badly needed in modern life—then they will stay. They will not otherwise.

It may be pointed out as indicating what can be done that this is an age of pictures. They are everywhere. They peer at one from every magazine. They grace the pages of every book. They hang upon the walls of every house Why, then, should not the motion picture become a permanent institution, amusing and instructing at the same time? There is no reason excepting what the cupidity of those engaged in making them may influence them to do.

All good people, either in or out of the industry, should exert themselves to do what they can to make these pictures the power for helpfulness they might become. In this way they will be fulfilling their own destiny and the pictures they influence will be passing along their helpful influence to others.

THE DISTANT RELATIVE

American Release, April 15

Marguerite and Pearl Alcott were sisters and orphans. Bob White and Charley Wells were friends and fellow-cowpunchers and, incidentally, Bob loved Marguerite and Charley had long cast amorous glances at the dainty figure of Pearl.

A day came when Marguerite and Pearl, orphans, were visited by the distant relative, a person of much self-importance and assumed authority. She at once began a reorganization of the girls' household, maintaining a self-appointed protectorate over the two girls much to the disgust of Bob and Charley. Finally the distant relative conceived an idea.

The result of this idea was a letter to an unscrupulous but good looking young man, who arrived shortly after and announced himself as a long-lost cousin. Marguerite didn't like his looks but Pearl soon fell victim to his city wiles, to the utter unhappiness of Charley.

The bogus cousin caused corruption among the ranch hands. They threatened a strike and it was only the heroic work of Bob and Charley that prevented a general walk-out. But if he did damage to the ranch by distilling trouble among its workers, he threatened twice as much by proposing to the foolish Pearl that they run away and be married. The cousin felt himself quite confident and he and the distant relative soon laid their plans for the poor girl's undoing, hoping by the marriage to gain control of the ranch. The distant relative and the bogus cousin discussed it thoroughly, and the bogus cousin promised to divide the estate with his confederate.

But what happened often to confederates happened to them. Bob White, chancing to step around the veranda, overheard. He kept the matter to himself for a few days when he suddenly was electrified to discover Pearl and the bogus cousin getting into the ranch buggy with suitcase and other externals of a journey. He promptly raised the ranch with his cries, horses were mounted and the chase began. It seemed impossible to overtake them. Down hills they came in precipitous haste but the buggy and its occupants kept steadily in advance of them. Suddenly an idea came to Bob. He stopped a passing automobile, climbed in with Marguerite and Charley and the chase was again resumed. At the outskirts of the town they overtook the flying pair. Charley received Pearl into his arms and the bogus cousin, along with the distant relative, were hooted out of town.

PHOTOPLAY MAGAZINE

We wish to call our readers' attention to an announcement (appearing on another page) of the Photoplay Magazine, a monthly periodical, which is published in Chicago and devoted entirely to the stories of the films of Independent manufacturers. It is a well gotten up magazine and interesting stories are told each month interspersed with interesting articles devoted to the motion picture industry. We implicitly believe that great help can be obtained from the storyizing of the film, and have no hesitation in recommending stories be read from the stage of any film being projected at the same time. Reference to our editorial of the 9th will exemplify this more fully. We wish the magazine success and will have more to say in later issues.

THE SOLAX SERIES OF MELODRAMAS

With Darwin Karr, the Genial Romantic Hero, as the Leading Man

Ordinary melodramas are very easily obtainable. The market is overflooded with them. They usually are melodramas with artificial situations and unreasonable climaxes. Climaxes often depending on the hero shooting six men with one shot, and on the villain smashing a cantilever bridge with one swing of an axe. Such melodramas are of the days of the hoopskirts and the white top hat.

To-day the public wants real melodrama. It wants things to happen that are possible. It wants the heart-throbs all right but it does not want you to try to insult its intelligence when you are giving them these heart-throbs and thrillers. It is wise to artificial situations concocted for unnatural effect.

The Solax Company has in preparation a series of big spectacular melodramas. Each of the series has been written by a well-known magazine writer now on the staff of the Saturday Evening Post and by a Beaux Arts graduate.

Both of these high-class men know human nature thoroughly. They have seen the world from every angle and have been in many curious places. The Solax Company is paying them record-breaking prices for the scenarios. "The Detective Dog," "The Sewer," and three or four others, the names of which will be announced later, are on the list and will be released sometime in April.

Darwin Karr, whose suave, kindly, romantic and heroic personality has been attracting so much attention in Solax productions, will play the leading role in this big series. His work in "The Sewer," the two-reel release of April 24th, and his performance in "The Detective's Dog," is sure to make him a moving picture idol.

THE DOVE AND THE SERPENT

Imp Drama, Release of April 4, 1912

Tortola was a dove and Luis was a serpent. She with her father, the old señor, led an ideal life until Luis entered the home. Her heart went out to him because he was handsome and persuasive. But it was not long before she discovered that the serpent, true to his imputed origin, was treacherous.

He fell in love, after tiring of his dove, with a picturesque girl, who belonged to anybody who would flatter her and gratify her whims for display and gaiety.

So the poor, little Dove went back home whither she was followed by the serpent, but it was too late. The fond and true lover, who had been in the background all through, claimed the wounded heart. A happy marriage, therefore, came to reward the trusting Tortola.

The story is laid amidst the still picturesque life in modern Mexico, and illustrates the passionate life led by the Latins in their love affairs.

Tortola is played by Margarita Fischer, and Harry Pollard is the lover who is finally successful in winning over the Dove to peace and happiness. Edward Lyons is the Serpent.

THE ROMANCE OF A GAMBLER

Nestor Film

This film is exceedingly good. The beautiful scenic effects which the mountain scenery of California afford, the luxuriance of its vegetation, and the balmy sunshine which makes it thus enable Nestor to reproduce in its films and augmented by the remarkable excellency of the Nestor Stock Company. "The Romance of a Gambler" is a touching story of generosity and self-sacrifice exhibited by the young gambler, who reforms from his bad habits because of his love and veneration for a young woman who incidentally marries another. The story is well told and full of interest.

THE F. & E. FILM COMPANY IN NEW QUARTERS

Due to a large increase in the volume of business of the F. & E. Film Company, that concern has moved its general offices from 710 Columbia building, Cleveland, to 104 Prospect avenue, in the same building but on the ground floor. The new offices give the company five times more space. They are handsomely furnished and many innovations have been added to facilitate careful and prompt handling of its business.

The F. & E. Film Company also, during the past week, opened a new branch office in Milwaukee, 721 Caswell block. This office as well as the Chicago office will be under the direction of Mr. E. Harvey Brient. The F. & E. Film Company recently purchased state rights for "A Victim of the Mormons" and "The Nihilist's Conspiracy," for Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin and Illinois.

Mr. S. S. Hutchinson, President the American Film Mfg. Company, returned to Chicago last week after a three-week sojourn in Sunny Florida. Mr. Hutchinson spent his time at St. Petersburg, Fla., where he found an abundance of good fishing, boating and bathing.

Time—The Present
Place—The Great Belgium Collièries

Realizing that she is about to die, the mother of Claire Lenoir writes a pathetic letter to her sister, Mme. Drouard, who is a widow and lives with her only son, Louis, a workman in the mines. She implores her sister to take care of her daughter. The mother and son, two noble hearts, are inclined to welcome the poor child with tenderness.

Louis is deeply impressed with the charm of his cousin. Love grows in his heart. At the house of her aunt, the orphan finds a warm shelter, of tenderness and peace.

Louis has a friend, Charles Marcourt, a miner like himself. Since their childhood the two young men have lived together like brothers. He, also, is charmed by the beauty of Claire. Although he is confident of Louis' love, he cannot resist his impulse. He loves her. Bolder than his friend, he makes love to her in very ardent manner, asking her to marry him. But, notwithstanding her cousin's timidity, she has guessed his secret. She repulses Charles. Grateful for the kindness shown her, and the tenderness she found in the home of her aunt, Louis will be her husband.

The engagement day arrives. Charles is overwhelmed by the atmosphere of joy in which he finds himself. He cannot endure the happiness of his rival. Suddenly he rises and goes in the direction of the river. He wants to die. Claire foresees a misfortune. She pursues the young man and reaching him at the water's edge, stops him from carrying out his fatal intention.

In a sisterly manner, she pleads with him. Louis observes them while thus engaged and misjudges the presence of his betrothed near Charles. Jealousy arises between the two men and a spirit of hatred is engendered.

The hate engendered in the hearts of the two rivals continues to the bottom of the mines. It grows more and more each day. The company's engineer, in making his daily tour of inspection detects the presence of fire damp and warns the workmen to leave the mine. He further advises them against opening their lamps.

Following his departure the miners are shown leaving the mine; however, the two rivals engage in an altercation and in the struggle which ensues a lamp is broken. A terrific explosion follows and everyone partakes in a panic stricken scramble for safety. Louis is uninjured but Charles is rendered helpless.

Louis undergoes a change of heart at seeing his wounded rival and compassion takes the place of hatred. He picks up Charles and desperately struggles on in an effort to reach a haven of safety.

The frantic miners dart here and there through dark passages and holes, while many are overcome and left dying behind. Louis is impeded in his progress by the helpless burden he carries and makes little headway.

Suddenly an underground lake bursts through the shattered walls of the mine and the passageways are flooded with water. The only opening to the stairs is cut off by the deluge before Charles and Louis can escape and they are left alone with the rising tide. The wounded rival is tenderly supported by Charles who, swimming through the muddy water succeeds in reaching a ledge where for a time they are safe.

Meanwhile the town is thrown into confusion. Fathers, mothers, wives and sisters rush franticly to the mine office to learn if their loved ones are still alive.

The dead and wounded are placed in one of the buildings nearby and here tears of joy for the living mingle with grief-stricken sobs of anguish for the dead. Claire and her aunt are among those who search the faces of the dead. The engineer bravely volunteers to take a body of men to the bottom of the mine. They find a herculean task before them but do not falter in the face of duty. After penetrating many dangerous passageways the engineer finally reaches the walled-in cavity where Charles and Louis were last seen by those who escaped to tell the story. Here they begin to dig, frequently tapping the huge stones and timbers and listening for an answering signal from beyond the mass of earth.

Louis and Charles, deprived of food and water, are becoming slowly exhausted. Facing death in its most terrible form they forget their once hatred. The dead embers of a lost friendship are revived. They give way to despair and pitifully await the end, locked in each other's arms.

Suddenly a faint tapping sound is borne to their ears and a wild hope that rescue is near at hand takes possession of them. With all his remaining strength, Louis picks up a piece of timber and pounds on the walls of their prison. Then they wait in stifled expectancy for an answer.

It comes! plain and distinct they hear the responsive signal of the rescuers. In vain does Louis implore his dying friend to bear up a little longer. Charles has passed to the Great Beyond praying that Louis might be saved.

The rescuers approach nearer and nearer the imprisoned miners. The engineer can be seen directing the work of digging. The muscles of his men stand out like whip-cords as they struggle with the huge rocks and timbers which block the passage.

Meanwhile Louis is becoming weaker and weaker. No longer is he able to answer the signals of the engineer. With a feeble effort he again tries to lift the timber to strike but fails. The air becomes oppressive, lights dance before his eyes, his lips become parched with thirst and he creeps toward the muddy lake below.

Outside the rescuing party finally succeed in breaking through the wall. The engineer is the first to crawl through the opening made by his men and by the light of his lamp finds their task has been for naught. Charles and Louis are still in death.

Sadly and reverently their brother miners remove the bodies to the surface, where they are tenderly laid in the chapel surrounded by lighted candles and flowers. Carefully the sad news is broken to Claire and her aunt. At the little chapel all is still and quiet save the sobs of the sorrowing.

Here the young orphan comes to mourn those who loved her too well. The engineer tenderly assures Claire of his respect and friendship and she feels a sense of protection stealing over her as she looks into his brave and honest face.

That he proved a loyal and devoted husband to the orphaned girl in after years is a fact no one can deny.

WHERE PATHS MEET

Imp Drama of April 1, 1912

The phase of life shown in this story is familiar to many. In a way it touches upon the aspect of things seen in the restaurant section of this, or any great city. In recent years restaurant life has become synonymous with adventurousness. The restaurant very materially helps to make domestic life in a great many cases unpopular, thus it has an important effect upon society of all kinds and grades. People seek change, excitement and novelty in restaurants of to-day, because as they aver home life is so dull and unattractive.

Hence, some excuse may be found for the "heroine," if heroine she may be called, of this film. She sought variety and excitement in a restaurant, being driven thereto by the very unlovely conditions of her home.

All would have been well if the girl had stopped there —if she had kept tab on each particular step she took. Restaurants are like deadly poisons, all right in their way if taken in doses well measured and administered, but if you overdo restaurant life, you will poison yourself spiritually as well as physically.

And this is what our little "heroine," Alice Ward, did. She tired of her homely admirer and her sordid looking home and sought relief in gilded restaurant life.

The issue of this adventure was inevitable. The poor, little country mouse came to grief. It happened also that her lover comes to grief for the same reasons and at about the same time. They finally meet and realizing how foolish they have been, decide to go home to the girl's father, who as a drunkard might fairly be looked upon as the instigator. The old man and the young couple swore off, and then there was a prospect of happiness.

This is a film with a real, if not an avowed moral. For the millionth time it warns old and young, rich and poor against the evils of over indulgence in strong drink.

The story is well worked out and very powerfully acted by Margarita Fischer, Harry Pollard and E. J. Le Saint, who show what fine artists they are by accepting these wholly ungrateful parts. H. S. Mack also creditably figures in the play, which is extremely well staged and photographed.

The report of the business agent was very gratifying and the coming week will see every member of the organization at work, as the call for Union Men has been very heavy.

Among the many matters taken up by the body was one that all delinquent brothers who were in arrears three months will stand suspended, and those who are six months behind in the payment of dues will be stricken from the books. Brothers that are in arrears can send their back dues by mail to Gus Durkin, care of Berkley Theatre, 19 West Forty-fourth street, or Harry Weinberger, 133 Third avenue. The meeting was dismissed by Chairman Samuel Kaplan at 4 p. m. It was one of the best conducted meetings I ever had the pleasure of attending.

Many thanks Brother Goldblatt for your letter but when you write again let's hear all the news and happenings in the hustling little town of White Plains.

* * * *

Brother Mike Berckowitz, who runs the Emergency Machine Repair Company, 210 East Fourteenth street, reports business very good. While he is working at the Eden Musee, where he has been employed for the past sixteen years as operator, the shop is in charge of his two able assistants, Herman Spivak and chief machinist Perry Bond.

* * * *

Brother Arthur Litchenstien paid a visit to New York from Monroe; he sure has a soft job; four nights a week, and looks very prosperous with his big fur coat.

* * * *

Brother Jos. J. Pross, who is spending his honeymoon in San Francisco, Cal., writes that conditions are fine at the Golden Gate. All the members of the Auxiliary send their heartiest congratulations through the Moving Picture News and wish you and your wife the best of luck and prosperity and a happy wedded life.

* * * *

Frank Tichenor, the hustling proprietor of the Manhattan Slide Company, 124 East Fourteenth street, is certainly a very busy man these days, as a visit to Slide Company any day will prove. It looks like a five and ten-cent store with its hustling crowd of exhibitors and operators and ? ? buying supplies, posters and renting slides.

* * * *

Brother Jesse Levine has just signed a contract with Sydney Drew and Company to open on the Orpheum circuit in Cincinnati next week with his vaudeville act "The Still Voice," There are nine people in the cast and the act went very good at Proctors, Fifth avenue, last week. I am sure he will have a long season.

Mr. Mason, who conducts several photo-play houses in Bayonne, N. J., reports business very good and as both his operators are members of the Union you can rest assured that the projection department of his theatres are well looked after.

Brother Harry Mackler, the hustling agent of the Simplex machine, has been kept very busy supplying operators and Simplex outfits for the Madame Sarah Bernhardt pictures for road work; he only wants the best

March 20th, 1912.

Some time ago I received quite a number of letters and cards from operators throughout the country, and I now take great pleasure in stating that Brother Costello and myself will be only too glad to answer any queries they may want to send into the "Chat Column."

Now Brother T. G. Robinson, Santa Paula, Cal.; Mr. J. H. Crowley, Coldwater, Kan, and "Picture Turner in the Sticks," get busy and let us know if you are still in the game.

CANUCK IN THE CATSKILLS.

* * * *

Now brother operators in Canada let us also hear from you. I am from the "Land of the Maple" myself and want to know how things are going in the good old Dominion.

* * * *

While on a jaunt 'round the city I dropped into the Acme Theatre, on the west side of Eighth avenue, near Twenty-fourth street, and was pleased to find a very good show.

I inquired of Mr. Lapp, the genial manager and proprietor, the name of the operator and he told me it was Mr. Jas. Ambrosio. Mr. Lapp also told me he was well satisfied with him as he was a very good operator, never having any trouble with his films or machines.

Wish you the best of success Brother Ambrosio, may you continue in the good work.

New York Lodge No. 1 gave a social and smoker at the Long Acre Athletic Club, 128 West Twenty-ninth street, on Sunday afternoon, March 17th. The committee are to be congratulated as they left no stone unturned to make the day one that won't be forgotten by any of the twelve hundred members and friends that filled the club house to full capacity, and many brothers who waited to secure the much sought for tickets to the last moment were turned away.

Represented among the visiting lodges were Boston No. 2, Philadelphia No. 3, Chicago No. 4, St. Louis No. 5, Cleveland No. 9, Detroit No. 12, Buffalo No. 18, Jersey City No. 24, Troy No. 27, Newark No. 28, Brooklyn No. 30, Montreal, Canada, No. 43, Spokane No. 47, Ottawa, Canada, No. 49, Norfolk No. 54, Springfield No. 75, Atlantic City No. 76, Elmira No. 93 and Asbury Park No. 105.

The I. A. T. S. E. Locals were in evidence in all parts of the house, Locals No. 1, No. 35 and Auxiliary of Local No. 35 had its full quota of members.

Marshal T. C. Boylan started the festivities at 2:30, with a sign to J. J. Armstrong, who officiated at the piano. His opening overture was composed of all the Irish airs, and when he concluded with the "Wearing of the Green" twelve hundred voices arose as one and St. Patrick's Day could not have received a warmer welcome than it did from the T. M. A.'s.

Marshal Boylan started the ball rolling with a wrestling match between Joe Browne, of the Y. M. C. A., and Kid Greene, of the Bronx, for the best two out of three falls, which was won by the former getting Greene's shoulders to the mat twice in less than ten minutes. While it lasted it was a corking good bout, but Browne was by many pounds the heavier, and the weight was too much of a handicap for Greene to overcome.

Referee, Walter Melville; time keeper, Joe Brant; announcer, T. C. Boylan.

The wrestling was followed by four good boxing bouts of three rounds each.

First bout: Joe Madden, of Brooklyn, vs. Mike Sweeney, of New York.

Second bout: Kid Broad, of Philadelphia, and his sparring partner, in a very scientific exhibition.

Third bout: Jack Burns, of Harlem, vs. Fighting Kid Albert.

The star bout of the afternoon was between George Bush and Ed. Callahan. Both members of Local No. 1, I. A. T. S. E. They both proved past masters of the manly art, being clever, willing to mix at close quarters; their judgment of distance, coupled with fast foot work and clever blocking for the three-round session, brought down the house. The stage has robbed the roped arena of two very promising boys, but neither performs before the applauding audiences with the spot light trimmings and the $500 per; they train behind the curtain line, with braces, props, long and short lines, heads up here, and dodging there, but, like Tanguay, they don't care.

The star of the long list of vaudeville acts was Edwin Brant, of the Garden of Allah Company, whose rendering of the "Confession" scene from the above play was heartily applauded; Mr. Brant proving himself an actor of sterling worth and an excellent entertainer.

The Hawaiian Trio scored heavily with their native songs and dancers. "The Rosary" was sung for an encore by one of their number in a very pleasing baritone, accompanied by the other two members of the trio on their native instruments.

Other acts that appeared were: Larry Wade, ventriloquist; Ed. Driscol, Local 35, I. A. T. S. E., songs and stories; Jerry Callahan, dancer; Al. Wilson, vocalist; James Dorman, balancer; The Two Coles, in "A Little Bit of Nonsense," and moving pictures.

As the crowd left for home they were unanimous in their praise of the good work done by the committee and to a man voted it one of the best days' pleasure they ever had. The New York Lodge as dispensers of good times is par excellence and the only regret the large assemblage had was that their entertainments were so few. Goodfellowship prevailed and the slogan of the committee was, eat, drink and be merry.

Fraternally,

TOM COSTELLO.

ALCOHOL, OR THE POISON OF HUMANITY

By Virginia West

Adapted from Eclair Release

AS MORIN came into the room his wife glanced at him with a look of painful questioning, though the action on her part was almost mechanical, so long had she greeted him with it.

"Marcel will be here in a moment and then we'll have supper," said the wife as the man left the room and started up the stairs.

In an instant he turned and came toward her with blazing, bloodshot eyes and clenched fists raised above his head.

"Don't stop me, don't stop me," he cried in a voice hoarse with rage. "You know I am going to sleep, and still you stop me! Don't do it again, I say; don't do it again or I'll——"

He choked and his voice rattled in his throat.

The wife sat perfectly still. As she looked at him there came into her eyes a look of infinite pity.

The paroxysm passed almost as quickly as it had come. The eyes cleared a little and a look of shame came into them.

"Mary, my wife, forgive me," he sobbed as he fell on his knees beside her.

"Yes, I forgive you, John, as I have always forgiven you. But you're breaking my poor old heart, husband, and you're killing yourself."

The old wife spoke in a voice almost dead. Her suffering had long passed the point where it is expressed with emotion.

"I'd be better dead," muttered the old man, "and it would be better for you and the boy."

"No, no, don't say that. Come, now, and sleep a while."

She took him gently by the hand and went with him up the stairs.

When Marcel came home he found his mother sitting with her head bowed upon the table in front of her. When she lifted her eyes to her son's face he saw that they were dry.

"Father?" he asked.

She nodded.

"Very bad?"

"Oh, no; he just went into a rage for no reason. The liquor gets more control over him all the time."

"Where is he?"

"Gone to bed. You know how depressed he always gets after one of his attacks. I thought he'd better try to sleep."

They ate their supper in silence. When they had finished the young man said: "Mother, I want to ask you something."

"Yes."

"Did father drink before I was born?"

The woman bowed her head.

"Oh, my boy," she said, "that is my sin."

"Your sin, mother?"

"Yes, dear. I knew that he drank. His own father warned me against marrying him. But I loved him and I foolishly thought I could reform him. Every woman thinks that. But he kept on drinking and—and you were born. Oh, my son," she cried in anguish, "I had no right to bring you into the world!"

Marcel drew her to him and tried to soothe her.

"You will never touch liquor, will you, Marcel?" she pleaded.

"No, little mother. I promised you before that I would not and I repeat it. If the desire for it ever comes to me I'll die before I'll yield." He paused for a moment, then continued in milder tone: "Lately, there has come a new reason into my life for not wishing to be a follower in my father's footsteps."

"Yes?"

Instinctively the mother knew what he meant.

"You know who it is, mother?"

"Miss Delaney?"

"Yes, Suzanne. Oh, mother, I love her so!"

The young man hid his face for a moment against his mother's breast. There he was sure of always finding sympathy.

"Does she know it, my boy? Have you told her of your love?" asked the mother as she lovingly smoothed his hair.

"I have not spoken, but I believe she knows it—I'm sure she knows it."

"And she loves you, dear?"

Marcel hesitated a moment. "I don't know girls very well," he said, "but I can't interpret her actions in any other way." He became thoughtful. "And yet—— Oh, mother, perhaps I'm mistaken."

"Tell me about it."

The voice was soft and caressing.

Marcel straightened up and took his mother's hands in his.

"Well," he began, "well, a few days ago when the men and Mr. Delaney were congratulating me on my new model I had justed tested, Suzanne happened to be at the shop. She made a point of coming over to me and telling me how glad she was I had been so successful. She told me the nice things her father had said about me at home and she hoped I would continue to do fine work. She knew I would, she said. And, mother, she looked so happy and there was such a wonderful light in her eyes."

The mother smiled.

"Yes," she said, "go on."

"And then to-day at noon I had to go over to Mr. Delaney's house to see him about something. Suzanne was in the garden. I stopped and spoke with her a moment. She seemed so genuinely glad to see me that I gave her the flower I had in my buttonhole. I—I don't know why—I wanted to do something and I didn't know anything else. And she held the flower so tenderly, though there were hundreds blooming all around her much prettier than mine. Mother, do you think I am foolish to believe she may love me? Do you think these things mean anything?"

He looked into his mother's face with eager, searching eyes.

"My boy," she said very gently, and in her eyes there glistened tears of tender memories, "my boy, you are not foolish to hope. Why don't you tell your love?"

"I will, mother—to-morrow. You have helped me so very much and have given me courage."

The next morning Marcel entered the shop in high spirits. He intended to speak that day of his love and he believed he knew what his answer would be. So he was very happy in spite of the trouble he always left at home and found there just as certainly on his return.

He was informed almost immediately on his arrival at the shop that Mr. Delaney wished to speak with him in his office. He answered the summons at once.

"Come in, Morin," said his employer pleasantly. "Sit down. I want to talk with you a while about some important matters."

The young man sat down.

"I think you are an exceptional young man, Morin. I've watched your work and I am very sure that you have a fine future before you."

"I thank you, Mr. Delaney," Marcel replied gratefully.

Mr. Delaney examined his pencil carefully on all sides before speaking again.

"Morin, I'm a pretty busy man," he finally went on. "I'm pretty busy, but I'm a father, and so I notice things I might not otherwise notice."

Marcel could feel his heart gradually increasing its beat.

"Suzanne, you know, is my only child, and I love her more than anything else in the world—yes, everything else in the world. Her happiness is my first consideration —always."

Delaney paused. Marcel could not stop the thumping of his heart, and yet he did not know what his employer was leading to.

"Of course, I have seen that there was more or less of a friendship between you and my daughter," said the older man, "but lately I have fancied—forgive me if I am premature, Mr. Morin—I have fancied that the friendship was—was growing more intimate. This is what I wish to stop."

The man stopped, almost confused, under the steady gaze of the young workman.

Marcel was thinking very hard.

"If I am mistaken, you will pardon me, I hope."

His employer's voice reminded him that it was necessary for him to speak.

"No, Mr. Delaney, you are not mistaken. I love your daughter and I trust—I am even bold enough to believe—she loves me. But no word has been spoken of this between us."

Mr. Delaney arose and walked to the window. Marcel continued:

"I am well aware, sir, that I am not socially your daughter's equal, but I believe you are too broad a man to let that influence you. You have spoken highly of me as a man. I should like your consent before speaking to Suzanne."

Delaney came over to Marcel's side. "You are right, young man. I would not let your social position stand in the way. It is not that. I am afraid of your heredity."

"You mean——"

"Yes, your father."

"But, sir, I am twenty-four and I have never taken a drink of liquor in my life. It is no temptation to me after what I have seen."

"I am sure you speak the truth, my boy," said the older man kindly, "but I cannot bring myself to let my little girl take the risk."

Marcel did not speak.

"You have not spoken to her, so outwardly there will be nothing to undo."

"But I love her; that I cannot undo," cried Marcel.

Delaney laid his hand on the young man's shoulder.

"I have a plan," he said, "and I want you to agree to it."

"Well?" asked Marcel dully.

"I must send someone to Chili on a very important mission. It is partly secret and needs a careful, superior man to accomplish it. Will you go?"

"At any other time I would gladly go, but now—well, now I will simply go—that's all."

For a moment the two men stood silently facing each other.

A light, almost of anger, suddenly burned in the young man's eyes.

"I could defy you," he said in a voice unlike his own.

"Yes, you could, but you won't. Her happiness is as precious to you as it is to me, and you know the risk is not fictitious."

"I cannot altogether accept your feeling in the matter," Marcel answered, "but you have put a doubt into my mind and so I must accept your decision. I may say good-bye to Suzanne?"

"Only in my presence," Delaney replied.

"When do you wish me to start for Chili?"

"To-morrow, and it is only fair to tell you that you may be gone a year, or even more. If you go I shall expect you to stay until your work is completed. I do not insist that you take this responsibility. I only say that it will mean a great deal to you in a business way,and—well, it seems wise under the circumstances."

Marcel sat thinking for a moment. He thought of his mother being left alone with his father, but he knew she desired his advancement more than anything else, even though it took him away from her. Then he thought of Suzanne and his heart sank. But, after all, how did he know that she loved him with a lasting love? Now was the chance to find out. If she really loved him she would not change in the time he was gone. And if her father saw that her feelings remained unchanged, he might alter his decision in the matter.

"I'll go," said Marcel rising, "and I'll be ready to start to-morrow afternoon."

"Thank you. I'm very glad of that decision."

Mr. Delaney held out his hand to Marcel.

"You had better go home now, for you'll need all the time you can get."

The young man's mother was delighted with the news of his advancement, but she sympathized with him fully in regard to his love for Suzanne and the necessity for leaving her.

When the elder Morin came into the room Marcel was sitting at a table with his head in his hands.

"What's happened?" he asked, looking from one to the other.

"Mr. Delaney is sending Marcel to Chili on very important business. It means great advancement," explained the mother.

"Good, good!" cried Morin, boisterously slapping his son on the back.

Marcel did not move.

"You act like you didn't want to go."

"I don't want to go," answered the son.

"Why don't you?" almost screamed the father.

"I realize the honor, but I don't want to go for personal reasons," answered Marcel quietly.

The old man tried to speak, but could not find the words. His face grew purplish red and he shook his fist in his son's face, and at last managed to gasp out: "You don't—care—for advance—ment. I'll show—you—I'll ——" Then raising a chair above his head he swung it toward his son. Marcel sprang to his feet and to one side, so that the chair descended upon the one on which he had been sitting.

The crash brought Morin to his senses. He stood for a moment as though dazed.

"My boy," he cried in distress. "Marcel, my boy, forgive me. I did not know what I was doing. Oh, what makes me act like that?"

"I do forgive you, father," said Marcel gently, "but you must promise me that you will try harder than you ever tried before not to drink. Promise me or I cannot go away."

The old man's lips trembled and his bloodshot eyes grew wet.

"I promise," he said; "before God I promise to do my best!"

When young Morin settled himself in the train the next afternoon his thoughts and feelings were greatly confused. The depression caused by the circumstances under which he was going was strangely mixed with a feeling almost of happiness by the memory of the pressure of Suzanne's hand and the clinging look in her eyes as she bade him good-bye. What could that look mean but that she loved him?

As this belief grew stronger in the young man's mind he determined to finish his work and return as soon as possible.

In the frequent letters Marcel received from his mother she tried always to cheer him and to say nothing that would lead him to think his father was not doing much better.

But the alcohol-diseased mind of Morin did not long remember the promise made to his son. Gradually his habit gained a stronger hold upon him until one day he was brought home from a nearby saloon almost unconscious from the effects of a terrible fit of rage over a card game.

Faithfully the devoted wife nursed him and saved the life that had been the cause of only misery to all with whom it came in contact.

The time of Marcel's stay lengthened from months into years. His task was great and important. He wished to finish it for its own sake and also because he felt that that was the only way he could hope to win Suzanne.

From time to time his mother encouraged him by telling him of little favorable signs that only a loving, hopeful mother would see.

At last, at the end of three long years, Marcel was to return. Successful beyond the dearest hopes of Delaney, he was received with many congratulations.

The first night after his homecoming Marcel did not sleep. He was thinking of Suzanne and of his father. He weighed well the possibility of his ever following in his father's footsteps. He could see no reason why he should. He had never touched liquor and he had no desire to do so. As for Suzanne marrying into his family—she knew what it was and she could choose.

When morning came he had determined to tell Delaney that he was going to speak to Suzanne whether he gave his consent or not.

"Mr. Delaney," he said the next morning in his employer's office, "before I give you full details of my work I wish to speak of another matter."

Mr. Delaney sighed and smiled almost sadly.

"I am sure you know what my subject is," continued Marcel. "I asked your consent three years ago to speak to your daughter of my love for her. You did not give it. My absence has made no difference in my feeling toward Suzanne, and I wish to tell you that I have determined to speak to her. I should like your consent. If I cannot have it, I shall do without it. If she still cares for me as I believe she did three years ago, I am sure she will be my wife. She is of age, you know."

After a short silence Delaney said:

"I know that I must give my consent, Morin. It is only just that I should. I like you and respect you highly, and my faith in you has become very great."

"Thank you, sir. You shall not have cause to lose faith in me. And you need have no fear in regard to my forming my father's unfortunate habit."

Marcel's manner and appearance would have commanded the respect of anyone.

Mr. Delaney held out his hand. "I believe you, my boy," he said. "Now go to Suzanne; I have kept her waiting long enough."

Marcel found Suzanne in the garden where he had given her the flower from his buttonhole three years before. She came toward him with outstretched hands. He took them quickly. Such was the light in her eyes that he drew her to him. "I love you," he whispered. There was no need for an answer; the moment they had waited for had come and they understood.

It seemed to Marcel that his cup of happiness was full. His wedding day was at hand and his father was doing better than he had done for many years. The son had hopes of having him presentable at his wedding.

And the old man was making an effort. He loved his son as deeply as a weak nature like his could love, and he was putting forth every bit of feeble will power he could command. But drink had already done its work. On the night of the marriage, when the guests had assembled after the ceremony, they were startled by a noise. The old man had dropped to the floor, stricken with apoplexy.

Careful nursing and loving watchfulness saved Morin's life, but, paralyzed on one entire side of his body, he would be a helpless invalid.

Grieved though the son and mother were, they soon found that their minds were much more at peace. For now they were relieved of the anxiety as to Morin's whereabouts. He was always at home, for the simple reason he had no power to go anywhere else.

Marcel had been made superintendent of the factory soon after his return from Chili. At first he was very popular among the workmen, and as he and Suzanne were ideally happy there seemed nothing for the present to be wished for.

About a year after his marriage complaints began to reach the ears of Mr. Delaney. He at first put them down to dissatisfied workmen and let them pass. Finally he felt compelled to call Marcel to his office.

"What's the trouble, Marcel?" he asked. "I keep hearing complaints of your treatment of the workmen. They say you reprove them unjustly."

"I'm sorry, sir," he answered. "I try to be just. I have noticed lately that I lose my temper rather easily. I think my nerves must be out of shape. I'll try to control myself better. Thank you for speaking of it."

Marcel had noticed that he seemed irritable at times, but accounted for it by overwork. He resolved to watch himself more closely.

But the attacks of anger did not leave him. Instead they grew worse, and with them came doubts and suspicions of those around him, and at last of his young wife. He knew they were unjust—that he was committing a crime to harbor them even for an instant. Each time after such an experience he went home filled with remorse and did all in his power to atone for the moment's doubt, although it was entirely unknown to Suzanne.

One day at the factory he heard one workman say to another: "Oh, you can't tell anything about women. I wouldn't marry one of 'em. She'd likely spend her time with some other man while I was at work. They all would if they wasn't afraid of getting caught."

What the man said enraged Marcel. He turned on him to strike him for such an insult. But instantly there sprang to his mind, as if some imp of hell had put it there, the thought that perhaps the man was right—perhaps his wife was with another man. He rushed from the factory and toward his own home.

Yes, he was right! There she was and there was the man. He did not see that the man was his friend, who often visited them; he did not see that they were sitting across the room from one another, nor hear that their conversation was such as might be heard by anyone. He only saw that his wife was with another man while he was at work. He was blind and unreasoning with rage. He seized a revolver from a drawer and fired at Suzanne.

When Marcel came to himselt he was in jail. Even then he could not clearly remember what he had done.

"Who are you? What am I doing here?" he asked of the man at his side when his mind began to clear a little.

"I am a physician. I was called in to see you."

"I'm not sick!" exclaimed Marcel.

"You needed quieting."

The doctor sat looking at him narrowly.

"But—but what am I doing——" Marcel looked around the cell, struggling to remember clearly the thing that seemed just out of his reach. Suddenly he sprang to his feet, then sank back upon his bed with a groan.

"I know now," he said. "I know now. For God's sake, doctor, tell me if I killed her!"

"No, but she is very low."

"Can't I see her?" Marcel cried.

When told he could not he was in utter despair.

"Oh, what have I done? What was the matter with me? I must have been crazy—crazy!" he raved.

The days crept slowly by. Suzanne hovered between life and death and Marcel remained in jail awaiting the result of his crime—waiting to know whether he had murdered his young wife whom he loved more than all else.

His mother came to him frequently and brought him what comfort she could. Many hours his attorney spent with him, but could get very little material to work upon from Marcel. So grief-stricken was he that it seemed to make no difference what happened to him.

Finally the lawyer went to the young man's mother. There he saw, for the first time, old Morin.

"My husband is an invalid," explained Mrs. Morin. "He is paralyzed and his mind is not clear."

The lawyer nodded his head in understanding.

"I want to talk to you about your son's case, Mrs. Morin," he began when they were seated.

"Yes."

"Your son tells me that he could not possibly have been intoxicated on the day that he—that he came home."

"That is true," the mother answered eagerly, yet anxiously, lest she take away some cause that might be accepted as extenuating by the jury.

"How are you sure of that?"

"Oh, sir, I would be sure to know if he ever touched a drop of anything. He has told you, of course, of his father?"

"No. He has told me almost nothing. In fact, I have great difficulty in getting him to talk to me at all. He seems utterly indifferent to the outcome of the trial."

"Poor boy," said the mother sadly, "he has not recovered from the shock. Oh, I don't know what could have been the matter with him. He must have temporarily lost his mind. He and his wife were devoted to each other."

Mrs. Morin could not keep back the tears, and for a moment they sat silent except for now and then a stifled sob.

"There, there, my dear Mrs. Morin," said Jackson gently. "I am convinced that there is something we have not yet gotten at, and I am determined to find it." He paused until she had gained control of herself. Then: "Tell me, what was it you thought your son had told me about his father?"

"I know you should know everything, Mr. Jackson, so I'll tell you. My husband has been a terrible drinker all his life. He has gotten worse and worse as he grew older. Marcel has seen all this and has never wanted even to touch any kind of liquor. He loathes even the smell of it. I know this. He could not deceive me if he wished, and I know he does not wish to and never has."

The clock struck and Mrs. Morin arose. "Excuse me," she said; "I must give father something."

A succession of incoherent sounds came from the old man in the chair and he vainly tried to reach for the bottle in his wife's hand.

"Is it brandy you give him?" asked Jackson in surprise.

"Yes, the doctor says he must have a little," was the answer, made almost apologetically.

Jackson frowned. "Perhaps he's right," he said doubtfully.

The old man drank down the brandy eagerly and into his eyes came a light of burning desire. He made what movements he could and uttered sounds that might have come from some animal. When his wife put the glass and bottle from his sight he struggled to rise. His face grew red and swollen and the blood seemed ready to burst from the veins in his eyes. In his effort to speak the saliva ran down over his chin.

Jackson turned away.

"I am sorry you should have seen that," Mrs. Morin said when she had succeeded in calming the old man a little.

"I am sorry, too, Mrs. Morin, for your sake. But for some reasons I am glad. I have a thought that may be very valuable. Now, may I ask you some questions?"

"Yes, anything you wish, sir."

"For how long has your husband been a drinker?"

"Oh, Mr. Jackson, I have never known the time when he didn't drink more or less."

"He drank, then, when you married him?"

"Yes, sir."

Mr. Jackson thought a moment.

"How long after your marriage was your son born?"

"About a year and a half."

"And these spells of anger—did they come only when he could not have what he wanted? Tell me all about it, Mrs. Morin. It is very important that I know."

The woman sighed as she said: "There's not much to tell. He's always had angry spells off and on, but not about anything in particular. The least little thing might throw him into a rage, and then again nothing would affect him."

The lawyer moved slowly back and forth across the floor, thinking deeply. He turned to Mrs. Morin and said, "Mrs. Morin, I think your son can be saved even if his wife dies. There is no doubt in my mind that he is a victim of heredity. I feel sure that when he went home that afternoon, for some reason he was enraged and was absolutely unconscious of what he was doing. He has inherited the tendency to these rages."

So it was on this that Jackson based his argument to the jury.

The trial was held back until it was known that Suzanne's wounds would not prove fatal. When the crisis was past she recovered so rapidly that she was able to be in court on the final day and give her testimony.

Mr. Jackson had had the elder Morin brought to the court room, and the sight of the helpless creature was a powerful aid to his argument. Long and earnestly he pleaded.

"You see this old man, gentlemen? He has not been really sober since his young manhood. This prisoner is his child—born after he had been drinking a number of years. See what a wreck it has made of this old man, gentlemen. Alcohol and nothing else brought him where he is. He has gradually been wearing away in mind and body. For many years he has been subject to attacks of terrible anger—blind, unreasoning anger—in which he was unconscious of what he did. I have shown you through witnesses that the prisoner's father has many times tried to injure, if not to kill, during these attacks.

"What of the son? He has striven manfully to keep himself out of the clutches of this demon and he has succeeded, gentlemen, as far as lay in his power. He has never touched liquor in any form. But subtly the enemy laid his hands upon him. I have showed you how this young man began having attacks of anger—mild at first—so that he thought he was only overworking and nervous. Then he grew gradually worse until the day came when an unreasoning suspicion took possession of him—a suspicion of the one he loved most of all—his wife. And he committed the crime of which he is accused without knowing that he did it.

"Weigh this matter well, gentlemen, before you bring your verdict. This man's wife and his mother need him and he needs them. They will watch him and care for him and help him to fight this hereditary enemy of his. And his father needs him—this helpless victim of his own weakness—he needs his son.

"I leave the case in your hands, gentlemen of the jury, and may God help you to see the truth."

As Jackson sat down there was no sound but a faint sobbing from Marcel. His confinement and grief had told much upon him and he was very weak.

The mother and Suzanne sat with bowed heads—waiting.

For a moment Marcel raised his head and looked toward the two women. Then he closed his eyes and they saw that he was deathly pale. They sprang to his side and put their arms about him just in time to prevent him from slipping to the floor.

When a physician reached him it was too late. He had died—an innocent victim of his father's weakness.

In a wheel-chair sat the old man, grinning and making an effort to point to Marcel where he lay upon the floor.

AMERICAN SECURES REMARKABLE LENS FOR CAMERA WORK

The new studio of the American Film Mfg. Co. is rapidly nearing completion. It promises to be one of the really fine studios of the country where productions of any magnitude may be staged. It is the last part of the American's new factory, located at North Edgewater, Chicago, to be completed.

In every case, the latest and most improved devices were used. Contrary to custom, the studios have been made in triangular shape, the camera man to occupy the niche where both side walls meet. Roof and sides are covered with a special glass whose diffused rays are expected to add considerably to the photographic results.

Probably the most interesting feature of the new studio is a new lens, never before used in any sort of photographic work, which has developed the astonishing speed of F 1.9. in optical terms which is several times faster than the most optimistic ever dreamed of. Among those manufacturers anxious to secure the best results the lens now in use is considered the fastest in the world. This operates at a speed of F 3.5. Hence, it will be seen that the American's new lens will be a distinct novelty.

In experimental work the new lens was used with gratfying results at 5:30 P. M. in the evening of a February day. The pictures were sharp, brilliant and in every way most satisfactory. No special lighting devices will be required in the American's new studio if this new lens lives up to its present record.

Cleveland, Ohio.—Arch. Steffens & Steffens will erect a new theater building at Superior avenue and E. 105th street.

MRS. JULIA R. HURLEY

Featured in the Reliance Production of "Mother," Released April 6th

"Mother," the Reliance release of April 6th, will in many respects be a noted production. It is a strong dramatic story of a son's ingratitude and a mother's sacrifice, and an abundance of heart interest carries the spectator through many big dramatic scenes back to the pathetic little mother who cannot think ill of her son no matter what his treatment of her. Mrs. Julia R. Hurley is featured in the role of "Mother," and her characterization is one of the exceptional features of the production. Mrs. Hurley is celebrating her 45th year on the stage, and is justly entitled to be called "The Grand Old Woman of the Stage." She began her career in Chicago at Colonel Wood's Museum in the role of Little Mary in "Waiting for the Verdict." One of the original "Oliver Twists," she has played with all the old Broadway stars as well as the later ones. She was for seven years at Niblo's Gardens and was rehearsing with James Fiske's company when that gentleman was assassinated. She was also in the famous Brooklyn fire, playing with Kate Claxton in "The Two Orphans," and has had experience in almost every branch of the theatrical business. Lately she has been making a wonderful success playing character parts with the different moving picture companies, and is at present one of the prominent members of the Reliance company.

"THROUGH TRIALS TO VICTORY"

An Interesting Story of the Loves and Disappointments of a Young Woman

"Through Trials to Victory," the three-reel subject soon to be distributed by the Great Northern Special Feature Film Co., is a touching romance that will appeal to the better natures of all lovers of a classic story. The plot of the story is a strong one and the finale satisfactory and logical.

Mona, a sweet young girl, is unsophisticated in the ways of the world and is heart whole and fancy free. She is the idol of indulgent parents and when she receives an invitation to visit friends in the country she goes with glad expectancy. It is the beginning of her strange and sorrowful romance. She meets Captain Platen, who is in charge of a company of soldiers quartered near. Platen is a designing roué and when he sees Mona he marks her for his own. She is infatuated with the dashing young officer and readily yields to his advances. They have stolen meetings—all dear to the heart of the unsuspecting girl. To the officer it means little. She will be forgotten in a short time. The captain begs for a photograph and by design calls for it as Mona is ready to retire. At his solicitation he is admitted to her room at an untimely hour.

Mona returns home to fall genuinely in love. She knows her affair with Platen was only the infatuation of a fleeting moment. The object of her affections is Lieutenant Sedorf, a young and honorable young officer. He loves Mona and they are happy. The courtship is conducted openly, with the sanction of her parents, and they are happy. They plan a wedding and have a house chosen in which to reside, and the preparations are going forward rapidly.

Lieutenant Sedorf visits the country and is invited by Captain Platen to visit his rooms. He does so and the friends are renewing old acquaintances when Sedorf in strolling about the room discovers the picture of Mona on the mantel. He is surprised, as he knows the reputation of his host as a trifler with women. On inquiring as to how and when Platen obtained the photograph the captain makes light of the matter and says it is a picture of one of his conquests, shrugging his shoulders. Sedorf is infuriated beyond reason and he strikes Platen across the face with the riding crop which he carries and strides out of the room, moody and resentful.

He finds Mona surrounded by modistes, who are preparing her wedding finery. She has adjusted the bridal veil and is strutting about the room in the exuberance of her joy. She runs to Sedorf with arms outstretched, but he waves her aside and dismisses the women. Then in scathing tones he denounces her for an impure woman and shows her what he has as proofs. She is dumb with astonishment, but finally, able to articulate, she makes a pitiful denial. He will listen to no explanation. She pleads but he is inexorable. She is not fit to be his wife and he casts her off forever.

As he leaves the girl falls moaning to the floor, heartbroken and disconsolate. She is seriously ill for many days and on being slightly convalescent she is sent to the country by her parents, who do not understand her malady. Sedorf has not explained, his honor forbidding. Mona is assigned her room and, during the night, walks in her sleep. She is followed by her host, a minister, and he sees her enter the room he occupied the night Platen called. She lives the scene of that fateful night over again with the clergyman for an auditor. It dawns on him—the scene he is witnessing has made a vivid impression on her life. The minister loses no time in securing an audience with Sedorf and he demands an explanation for casting off the girl. Sedorf reluctantly tells him, and then the minister speaks. He soon convinces Sedorf that he has wronged the girl and the young officer listens and believes. He is surprised and delighted.

Mona is soon made happy, for her lover seeks her out and contritely asks her forgiveness, satisfied of her purity and innocence of any wrong.

It is a beautiful and satisfactory finale to an interesting story, cleverly told.

NESTOR NOTES

The Mountain View Inn, an enchanting hotel in beautiful Hollywood, Cal., not far from the studios of the Nestor Film Co., was completely destroyed by fire Thursday, March 14. Among the many guests who had thrilling escapes from death were Mr. and Mrs. David Horsley and their little son, "Buckeroo" Stanley; Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Rickett; Mr. and Mrs. Milton H. Fahrney and various leading members of the Nestor stock companies. At least twenty lives were saved, due wholly to the prompt and fearless work of Alfred E. Christie, who, together with Messrs. Tenbrook, Maloney, Murphy, Woods, Brierly, Edwards, Harris and Horace Davey, all Nestorians, rushed to the ill-fated hotel and, disregarding death, fought the fiercely raging flames with exemplary heroism and stopped only when there was no one else and nothing else to save. Mr. Horsley wires that he had no idea the Nestor Co. possessed so many true-blue heroes.

Messrs. Pritchard and Moraine, camera men, took some long chances in order to take a number of excellent pictures of the fire, the havoc, the fighters, the rescues, et al. About two hundred feet of this sensational picture will shortly be seen on the screen.

Sidney Ayres, the well-known ector and long identified with Selig, is now scintillating in Nestor motion picture plays. The first Nestor release featuring Mr. Ayres will be announced in the very near future. What a matchless combination Nestor photography and Ayres' acting will make!

NOTES OF THE WEEK

For years the theatrical world has proceeded on its humdrum way, neither fearing nor sustaining loss from an outside quarter, nor even dreaming of such a possibility. Its bulwarks were apparently well guarded and safe.

At length, however, the enemy has appeared in the camp, and the question with theatrical managers is, "What shall we do to be saved?" The innocent and totally undesigning intruder is no less a personage than Mr. Movie.

The moving picture has for the past sixteen years unpremeditatedly been establishing a veritable powder magazine which ere the close of the sixteenth year of the life of the "movie" has exploded.

However, this explosion, let us hope, simply means a readjustment of things generally, and a large life for the art of expression. And may those things which have struck cold to the heart of large theatricals prove to be but a school for the cultivation of a higher appreciation of the art of expression in all its branches.

One of the most auspicious signs of the times comes to us in the proposed erection of a $2,500,000 building on the present site of the old Mendelssohn Hall, the first four floors of which, on the Forty-first street side, will be devoted to the Kinemacolor Theatre and offices, the theatre seating 1,400 people, and with two dollar prices—so 'tis rumored.

Says Robert Grau in the Review of Reviews:

Looming up on the horizon, a still greater menace to the old-time stage and its people, there appears the so-called "talking picture," a synchronization of the cinematograph and the phonograph, in which electrical science plays an important part. Already in London and Paris the talking pictures are a craze. So promising have been these reproductions of plays and operas that two of our most prominent producers, Charles Frohman and Henry W. Savage, competed for the American rights. "Quo Vadis" has been photo-played, with the spoken parts taken by the phonograph, while "Pinafore," "The Mikado" and the "Chimes of Normandy" have also been produced on the screen, their tuneful strains proceeding from the "canned orchestra."

A more ambitious and promising scheme, however, seems to be that undertaken by the New York Philharmonic Society, with the collaboration of President J. Stuart Blackton of the Vitagraph Company. This will be no less than the production of the famous operas, the actions and scenes appearing in the moving pictures, while the classic music of the composers is rendered by good orchestras. This will be tried out in some of the large cities first, and if successful, may well lead to the popularization of the best works of the masters and the general enjoyment of what is now for many thousands an unattainable luxury.

Thomas Alva Edison has also turned his inventive genius in the direction of a mechanical theatre. The "Wizard of Menlo Park" has announced, simultaneously with this writing, the completion of the "Edison speaking pictures." Very recently, too, Edison uttered the prophecy that within a very short time the workingman will be able, by laying down his dime at the modern theatre of cinematography, to enjoy grand opera and dramatic productions, with sound, dialogue, color and action, all scientifically reproduced—a complete conquest, apparently, by science, of the art of musical and dramatic entertainment.

The moving pictures taken by Frank T. Coffyn while his machine was making nearly eighty miles an hour in a stiff wind, at an altitude of approximately 1,000 feet, were clearest of all, says Dame Rumor.

John Von Pomer, the electrician at the Bijou Theatre in Fort Edward, has invented a system of pulleys which can be propelled by a motor and which will do away with the winding of reels by a crank in a moving picture machine. Not only is the turning by crank done away with by this new machine, but it assures a steadier and consequently clearer picture.

"Among the new jobs that modern life has originated," said a statistician, "that of the cloud spotter is interesting and odd.

"The cloud spotter doesn't, of course, make spots on clouds. No, no. He stands on a high roof with a costly field glass, and he continually notifies his employer, a moving picture maker, of the condition of the heavens.

"You see, for an elaborate moving picture play, a steady, uniform light is essential. The pictures must be taken all in sunshine or all in clear gray light. Otherwise they differ. Some are weak and some strong. They don't match on the screen.

"So the cloud spotter on the roof, searching the heavens with his glass, studying the course and velocity of the wind, assures his boss of a good half hour or hour for photographing a moving picture play, and thus saves a waste of films that would otherwise be many times larger than his frugal salary."—Kansas City, Mo., Journal.

The motion picture actor's life is a hard one. He is sometimes almost as much of a hero in real life as he is in the pictures. Some of the plots in which he is required to act are so full of hardships that there is no doubt the life insurance companies will soon raise his premiums.

A film just issued by the Selig Polyscope Company is a case in point. It was taken the day following the big snow storm of two weeks ago, when the drifts were piled high. The Selig actor, in the lightest of bathing attire, was forced to run for miles and miles through the drifts that covered the brick yard excavations along the north branch of the Chicago River.

As a climax of his day's work he had to plunge and burrow headfirst through a four-foot drift. In the play he was cavorting under the influence of hypnotism, but in real life he had nothing to help him except a good constitution.

But then, the people must be amused, and "hypnotism," with its snow bather will help.—Cleveland, Ohio, Leader.

It is reported that $15,000 has been offered for the moving picture rights of "The Garden of Allah," and was refused.

That Kinemacolor has taken its place in the social as well as the theatrical world is evidenced by the fact that during the past few weeks the Durbar, Coronation and other series taken by this wonderful process have by special "command" been shown: At the residence of Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, 637 Fifth Avenue, on the occasion of a dinner to the German Ambassador and other distinguished guests; at Sherry's; Delmonico's, the Hotel Plaza, the Union League and Crescent Clubs to say nothing of a score or more of less known organizations conducting charity benefits.

That the thousands of women and children patrons of Chicago's 5-cent theatres are protected against the exhibition of sensational and immoral moving pictures was shown recently in the annual report of Chief of Police McWeeny, who points out that the moving picture bureau of the department during the last year condemned 16,211 more feet of undesirable films than in the preceding year. The report also estimates that the city will net an income of $15,000 during the coming year as a result of the passage of the ordinance charging a fee of 50 cents for each moving picture permit issued.

Maud Lillian Berri, the wealthy prima donna, found that the moving picture might be pressed into service in a rather out-of-the-ordinary way. The fears of her mother, who was at the time 3,000 miles away from her daughter, and who had had a dream that her daughter was very ill, were allayed by Miss Berri sending her mother a moving picture of herself at an outing in a Chicago park.

* * * *

A battle of theatrical producers and play writers against the motion picture interests of the country was staged recently before the house committee on patents. At a hearing on the Townsend bill, to relieve motion picture producers of damages for innocent reproduction of copyrighted plays, the theatrical producers made a bitter attack upon what they termed the invasion of their rights by the film-producing companies.

William A. Brady, a New York producing manager; Augustus Thomas, the playwright; Ligen Johnson, attorney for the National Association of Producing Managers; and other representatives of the theatrical business said that the proposed change in the laws would open the way to an evasion of theatrical copyrights by the moving picture concerns.

The copyright amendments proposed by Representative Townsend would operate to relieve picture concerns from the penalties of the copyright law when they unwittingly reproduced a copyright play. Mr. Brady and other opponents of the change said it would also take away the right the theatrical managers now have to secure injunctions against the unauthorized use of their plays on the picture films.

Four hundred and fifty pupils of the New York Institution for Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb were made to hear the tones of the theatre organ and were compelled to prove that they heard it at the Kinemacolor Theatre, in West Fortieth street, an afternoon not long ago. The experiment was made at the suggestion of Dr. Enoch H. Currier, principal of the school, who is the founder and originator of a system of instructing deaf mutes, called "musical vibratory massage." This system is based on the assumption that hearing is an acquired faculty, deafness being the natural condition of the new born infant. By this system, also. articulation is stimulated by development to the point of speech.

"The history of the stage within a very few years will be written, not by the erudite historian, but by the moving picture mechanician," declares Nazimova. "Instead of reading in books the impression of some perhaps prejudiced or overly enthusiastic critic, the coming generations will see on the screen of the moving picture theatre what the stage figures of the present really did, instead of reading about it. They will see, not hear, and seeing is believing.

"Mark me," she says, "in an incredibly short time every stage artist, no matter of what renown or position, will be appearing before the lens and shutter, for they will realize that only by so doing will they be able to make any enduring mark upon the artistic scrolls of their time.

"I am crazy to appear before the machines myself; I want to perpetuate whatever art I have. As the greatest operatic art of the world is now preserved for all time by the phonograph, so will the dramatic art be handed down by that marvelously potential little machine which spins through its messages of entertainment and instruction.

"Take the young actor or actress whose artistic schooling is just in progress. Could the principles of pantomime, the value of action as opposed to dialogue, which is so hard to learn that many actors never know it at all, ever be brought home as conclusively in any other way?

"Another direction in which the new movement will be tremendously beneficial will be that of self-study and improvement. As the mirror is so essential in obtaining the proper effects in make-up, adornment and the like, so will the pictures be in framing the visualization of an important role. Now we can tell nothing about the acting picture we present to our audiences—not at least until the next day, and then it is often too late.

"Acting is sometimes considered impulsive and spontaneous, and the more it partakes of these qualities the more it is real acting, but an effect, seemingly natural, is oftentimes the result of long and careful thought, and even then it might seem wrong or incomplete if we could see it ourselves."—Pittsburg, Pa., Sun.

Not much escapes the wide-awake camera man. Not long ago at an official seizure of fifteen barrels of wines and liquor over on the Bowery, and its consignment to the sewer, the camera man turned in every inch of the scene on the moving picture film.

Branches in Hongkong and Shanghai have already been planned for.

The following from the New Haven (Conn.) Register, which we presume is a side slap at Champ Clark with regard to his posing for moving pictures, speaking his speeches into the phonograph, etc., is rather amusing:

"The reply of the American to the Englishman who asked what 'you Americans do with the vast quantities of tomatoes you raise, don't you know,' has become a classic. 'We eat what we can,' he answered, 'and what we can't eat we can.' In like manner, to the natural query as to what we do with all our candidates, we might reply: 'We elect what we can, and what we can't elect we can.'"

Says R. L. Flynn, Boys' Work Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., Kansas City: "It is important to censor films—no one should question that—but it is equally important to censor the scenarios from which pictures are made."

This is a very sensible suggestion which it might be judicious to act upon.

To cost $26,000 for construction alone, a vaudeville and motion picture theatre will go up at 2426 Pennsylvania avenue, one door south of North avenue. It will be built by Frederick W. Schanze. Architect Paul Emmart has finished the drawings and application for the erection of the playhouse has just been made at the Building Inspector's office. According to the drawings, the building will be one story high, of concrete and reinforced concrete, with granite and marble ornamentations. It will front 34 feet and extend back 140 feet and will be fireproof. The interior is to be finished in hardwood and oak, while the facade will be elaborately decorated. Work on building the theatre will start at once.

This house, which is splendidly equipped in every particular, fireproof, a $5,000 pipe organ, etc., has a seating capacity of 1,600 persons.

In addition to the big organ there is a grand piano, and in the lobby cathedral chimes played from the organ keyboard.

Says the Oakland, Cal., Tribune, of the motion picture industry:

"It cannot be destroyed, for it enables one to travel, with the aid of the eye, into strange lands among strange peoples, and see in photographic detail the wonders of the earth. Within judicious scope and under proper direction, it can be made an enlightening moral influence, of great service to mankind. The thing to do, therefore, is to take it out of the hands of blackguards and fakers and away from the proximity of saloons and other demoralizing surroundings. In that way it can be made a potent agency for the social uplift."

Manager Rodriguez, of the Shubert Theatre, at Broadway and Monroe street, declared to-day that the wrong impression had been conveyed to the public concerning the taking of that theatre by Marcus Loew on April 8th. A story was printed to the effect that the theatre was to become a moving picture house indefinitely. Mr. Rodriguez said to-day that Mr. Loew will simply take the theatre over under a lease for the summer as he did last season, and that in the fall the theatre will be devoted to first-class attractions as usual.

Mr. Loew will take possession of the house two weeks earlier than he did last season. When his season ends in the fall the management promises some of the best productions that will come to Brooklyn, at the popular uptown theatre.—Brooklyn, N. Y., Times, March 18th.

There was a groan of protest at the opening of the Child Welfare Exhibit in the downtown Italian quarter of New York. The rooms of the Children's Aid Society were crowded with women and children when the cinematograph threw upon the screen a picture of a baby's bottle with rubber nipple standing upon a table. Flies buzzed around it, settled upon it, crawled over it. Then the canvas showed an enlargement of a fly, and its feet were seen to be covered with filth and the polluting germs of all disease. In a flash the bottle reappeared; a pretty woman holding a darling baby arrived in the picture, picked up the bottle and put the nipple into the baby's mouth. And the women present cried out in indignation. The lesson had been taught.—N. Y. World.

Charles B. Boyd, theatrical manager of New York, has leased a tract of ground at De Belivere and Wabash Tracks, according to the St. Louis, Mo., Globe Democrat. Upon this plot, which is 167 feet by 309 feet, he purposes erecting a large cafe to be called the Alpine Inn and Vaudeville Garden, at a cost of about $60,000. The Inn is designed in the German villa style, and will have behind it an open air garden with a stage at the far end, where bands, vaudeville and moving pictures will amuse the 3,000 people which the accommodations of Inn and Garden will afford to be seated.

At the recent meeting of the superintendents' department of the National Educational Association in St. Louis the stereoscope and the moving pictures, as parts of the school system, were discussed by the educators at length, and it was freely predicted that in a short time the moving picture would be used in the public schools as it is used in the large universities of the land.

Peary and Amundsen should be photographed together, and could easily add features relating to exploration that would be highly interesting in a motion picture show. Their achievements, in one sense, are as far apart as the poles, but they will be awarded a joint place in the world's annals.

Posterity will have the advantage of seeing history preserved by the camera and reel. It is doubtful if any veritable picture of Shakespeare exists. Washington's appearance is preserved only by pencil and brush. Coming generations will have the best of it in portraiture. But there is a pleasure in handing along improvements. The discoverers of the North Pole and the South Pole would make a strong team for artists.—St. Louis, Mo., Globe-Democrat.

A VISIT TO THE OFFICES OF THE POWERS MOTION PICTURE COMPANY

By Our "Roving Commissioner"

A visit to the business offices of the Powers Company revealed many things to the writer—things which are of interest.

Firstly, I find that quality is the primary thought with the Powers people; and, secondly, they have entered in with the public in that insatiable desire for laughter which marks American audiences. They are going in principally for the production of good comedy, with, of course, a little drama thrown in on the side.

Over at the Powers laboratories, 416-422 West Two Hundred and Sixteenth street, there has just been completed a new tinting and toning room, whence will emanate something new and startling in color effects.

Never were things in a more prosperous condition with this firm than they are at the present time. Down in New Mexico, where one of their companies have been wintering, some splendid work is being turned out. Recently they have been obliged to move their quarters back into the mountains on account of the trouble on the border. This, however, is not in any way detrimental to the work, as these same mountains which afford shelter will also add greatly to the scenic effects to be gained in the pictures. In New Mexico there is a wealth of old romantic situations which are capable of weaving themselves into many a story with the aid of the clever scenario writer. These situations and locations are being taken advantage of by the stock company of the Powers.

From Las Cruces the company have moved to Alamogordo, among the mountains.

A new director is due to start work at the New York studio at once. Mr. H. M. Matthews, who is about to commence his work of production at the Powers studio, augmenting the present splendid directing staff who have given to the public so many fine productions, is late of the Edison Company. Mr. McGovern and Mr. Wall, whose work of producing frequently stretches far into the night, in order to satisfy the large demand for Powers' productions, have welcomed Mr. Matthews with a glad hand as a competent and much-needed helper.

Another star has also been added to the Powers Stock Company in the shape of Mr. John Charles. Mr. Charles was for some time a valued member of the Pathe stock.

The camera men of Powers, who are so deserving of praise, are Mr. A. H. Leach and Mr. S. Hines, who keep the crank turning at this end of the business, and Mr. Alex Neilson, who wanders with the South company among the mountain fastnesses of New Mexico.

Mr. Evans, who is business manager at the New York offices, needs little commendation to the public, being well known as one of the most capable men in the business. Mr. Giles Warren, who with his attentive assistant Miss Christine H. Van Buskirk, holds up the advertising and scenario editing end of the business, was for some time connected with the publicity department of the Lubin Company.

My visit to the Powers studio was brightened and made more interesting than usual by a short interview with the clever leading lady of the company, Miss Ethel Elder,

Miss Elder is very sweet of personality, and impresses one with the impression that she is ever of the helpful, gentle type that is so refreshing to meet in this age of boisterous, loud voiced, loud dressed women. I was indeed pleased with the few moments spent with this lady. Miss Elder is very young, at least so appearances would say, and reminds one of a blossom whose petals shrink from the cold, dark shadows, but open fully, and beautifully, and fragrantly to the warm rays of the sun.

Miss Elder's experience has been large for one so young. In addition to having headed a stock company of her own, she has played leads in "Marching thro' Georgia," "The Heart of Maryland," and other well-known productions. She was the support of Robert Edeson in "The Traveling Salesman," and has been for some time a leading light in the moving picture industry, being for some time leading woman of the Lubin stock.

Mr. P. A. Powers, who has been absent from town for some time, has at last returned. His presence will no doubt be an added impetus to the work of the firm.

CHARLES GERKE MARRIED

Charlie's gone and made the jump! He has taken unto himself a wife, and the bunch needn't look for him any more nights, for he will be comfortably toasting his feet by his own fireside. And they say he really has got some fireside, up in New Rochelle. Charlie, of course, since we mention New Rochelle, can be none other than Mr. Charles Gerke, of Thanhouser Company. The wife was Anita Arnstoo. It happened February 10th, but somehow the news only just leaked out. But, then, Charlie always was a modest soul and he had to do the hitch act the way he went about everything else—real quiet. Gerke is a pretty old man in the film business, although he is a pretty young man at that. But, then, the whole industry is a pretty new one. Gerke started in the business at the Lubin plant in Philadelphia and left there to take charge of the printing room in New Rochelle when the Thanhouser company started operations.

KERRIGAN HAS BAD FALL

Warren Kerrigan, that popular star of the American Film Mfg. Company, suffered a bad fall while acting an Indian part in a coming American release entitled, "Indian Jealousy." This picture is notable for some beautiful backgrounds in a nest of heavy boulders near La Mesa, Cal.

The scenario called for a thrilling fall down the side of one of these giant boulders. Kerrigan, attired in Indian costume, refused to rehearse the actual fall but promised to do his best when the camera began clicking. Mounting the rack, which is a trifle over fifty feet high, closely pursued by a posse, Kerrigan threw up his arms and allowed himself to fall backward. His body hurtled downward with tremendous speed, striking rocks and brush on its way. The brush assisted in breaking the fall but did not prevent Kerrigan the pain of a much bruised body, and slightly sprained arm. The part called for much heroism and Kerrigan is to be congratulated on his more or less lucky escape.

FRITZI BRUNETTE

FROM OUR WESTERN CORRESPONDENT

Hot Sprinks, Ark., March 20.—Lo and behold, the King came, he saw, he conquered! Who? you ask. Why King Baggot, of moving picturedom in general and the Imp Company in particular. He has been here; he has mingled with the elite of the resort, both resident and visitors; he has been initiated. If there has been anything that he has not seen it has been his fault, and, just between us, you understand, from my personal associations with this stellar attraction of the moving picture world, I have not heard that he overlooked any bets. Far be it from such, all of which, I think, calls for a little elucidation.

I walked into the Business Men's League headquarters the other day and Secretary George R. Belding said:

"We have visiting here a very distinguished gentleman. I want you to meet him and mention him in your list of prominent arrivals."

The face was familiar, but, not expecting the Imp's leading man, I did not at first recognize him. The moment I heard the name, however, being in possession of moving picture "dope," I immediately knew who he was, and we had quite a friendly greeting. King Baggot asked me if I was interested in moving pictures, and when I told him that I was the Western correspondent of the Moving Picture News he jumped to his feet, exclaiming, "What! the 'Man in the Baths'?"

And after that, Mr. Editor, you will understand that it was quite a fraternal session.

King Baggot decided that he needed rest and recreation, and whether he got it or not, deponent refuseth to state. Suffice to say, however, he had a good time, and he met every one worth meeting. He visited the Horse Show and hobnobbed with the "smart set" there; he shook hands with Andrew Carnegie, and one bright afternoon I happened to pass the Buckstaff bathhouse and observed him engaged in earnest conversation with none other than Frank J. Gould, who made things merry at the Eastman Hotel. In other words, Mr. Baggot exemplified his front name in every sense of the word, and he tells me that he had a most delightful sojourn. He looks the picture of health, too, and all of us regretted that an important wire called him back to the Imp studio so soon. If the Imp Company want to increase their already large following, all they will have to do is to grant their leading man a good leave of absence, and I venture the prediction that it won't be long before he is making tracks to this pretty Ozark resort. And, also between us, ask him if the town is really shut up tight or if the visitors are having a good time. Inquire if the "Tiger" is confined to its cage or whether this interesting amusement is possible to those who would view the same.

We are waiting here for the Hot Springs motion pictures I wrote about some time ago. I know of no reel in recent months that is being looked forward to with so much pleasant anticipation as this one, for so much depends on it. Backed as it is by the Business Men's League, it is regarded as one of the most important factors in the city's great advertising scheme. Advertising, by the way, is what has made Hot Springs popular this year. Will you believe me when I state that the picture houses are doing the greatest business in their history? Will you think that I am juggling the truth when I write that for the first time in the resort's history every hotel in the city was filled and it was impossible to accommodate more? Why, good friends, the past week the Superintendent of the Government Reservation, Harry H. Myers, issued a public request through the newspapers to send him a list of vacant rooms or places where accommodations could be secured, in order that he, in turn, might retail this information to the visitors. That is "going some," and the moving pictures are looked forward to as being the medium which will show the world generally Hot Springs as it is, with its many attractions and its great crowds.

I saw most of the pictures so far as the local views go, when they were taken, and if they are not a success it won't be because the city hasn't labored earnestly to make them such. I would advise every picture manager in the country taking the Independent service to book this reel when it appears, for you will have a feature, Mr. Manager, you will not forget. Don't think that it is an advertising picture, either, for it is not, as there will be involved in the story some of the best comedy and heart interest that one would care to look at. Take this tip from one who knows. Watch the advance synopsis that you will receive, and when you recognize the Hot Springs reel, book it quick, for it is a dandy. You will see some of the finest horses in the world there, entries in the horse show; you will see Andrew Carnegie, Frank J. Gould, the city as it really is, and with it all will be a story that will linger long after the house is dark.

Local managers realizing the necessity of not doubling up on "repeaters," have at last managed to get their exchanges lined up on a definite system that is bringing great results. All of the houses, whether Trust or Independent, receive from their exchanges now their program in advance, and should one manager learn that another house is showing a reel that is booked to him the day following or later, it enables the man to cancel the order and thus avoid showing a picture that a competitor had before him. It is a good system, and as it is working so well in Hot Springs I see no reason why it could not be considered in other cities. The New Central and the Photo Play are finding this of great advantage. It enables them to keep away from the Lyric and Princess program, and I have not noted a single "repeater" here in weeks. What is the result? Well, business has picked up materially and one doesn't hear a patron standing in front of the house say: "No, don't go in there. I saw that picture at another theatre yesterday." And such a statement is heartbreaking, believe me.

Thanhouser got to the "Lady in the Baths" the past week in their reel, "A Niagara Honeymoon," for she tells me that it contained pictures of Buffalo, N. Y., her former home, and Port Jarvis, where we decided, with the aid of a good minister, to travel in double harness some years ago. I didn't get to see it, but she has given her "O. K." to this feature, so, Thanhouser, we thank you.

The trade generally may not know it, but Frank J. Gould is one of the greatest moving picture "fans" in the country. If there is any good reel that he overlooks it is because it is impossible, owing to other engagements, to get to see it. He told me when here that he has bought a moving picture camera for his own personal use and carries it about the country with him. He takes his own pictures and then has them developed. He considers the moving picture camera the greatest invention of the age and took a number of views when he was in Hot Springs.

The "Jesse James" reels played a return engagement at the Photo Play Theatre recently and did a big business. Evidently the public never tires of this Western feature, which, I hear, is prohibited in other cities.

I understand that the crusade waged by the club women in Memphis against the "dumps" where moving pictures were shown has brought good results, and that the trade there is on a better footing than ever before. Memphis' picture industry needed a "house cleaning" and the business has been more respected since it took place.

THE MAN IN THE BATHS.

FRANK WINCH RESIGNS FROM CIRCUS

Frank Winch, one of the best known press agents in the country, has resigned from the Barnum & Bailey Circus, which opened this week at Madison Square Garden. Early last fall Mr. Winch, who was the general press representative of the Buffalo Bill Show, was engaged by John Ringling for the Barnum & Bailey Circus this season.

The week that Mr. Winch was to commence his duties with the circus he resigned, owing to business matters that will require his presence in New York City for some time to come.

Two years ago Frank Winch broke into the publicity game in New York by resigning as the Eastern manager of a prominent amusement weekly. The record he established then with Buffalo Bill and subsequently maintained for two years on the road was phenomenal. Winch has the faculty of getting stuff by the editor in pages.

Mr. Winch has made no announcement as to his future plans.

"WHERE PATHS MEET"
Imp Release, April 1

Example is stronger than precept. If this were generally felt in real life, there would be less misery and less unhappiness in the world. Old Reuben Ward had a pretty daughter who helped him keep house by working behind a store counter. The child, for she was little more, had a manly young lover, and their acquaintance had reached that stage when an engagement was entered into.

James Bright purchased the ring for his bride-to-be, and in his Sunday best made his way to Reuben's home for the purpose of presenting the ring to little Alice.

The girl was not proof against flattery, and earlier in the day had listened to the honeyed accents of a chance admirer, who came to the store. She foolishly made an appointment with him for that evening. Probably she would not have kept the appointment, but her father and fiance fell to drinking. This disgusted the girl, and she sought temporary relief from the alcoholic atmosphere, in the automobile of her admirer.

As the French say, "It is the first step that counts." From the automobile ride to the gilded glories of the Tenderloin or Broadway was an easy and logical step. As the girl entered on this path her lover chose a parallel path with alcohol as the guide.

After a few months, poor Alice, being cast off by her admirer, penniless and faint, staggers into a low saloon to obtain drink. She had not the money to pay for the spirits she ordered. She was insulted by one of the saloon loungers. There was a quarrel and a row, and she was rescued from further degradation by a man who was unrecognizable at first. It was her former lover, James Bright. So their paths had met in a low saloon from practically the same causes.

But the spark of manhood was not extinct in James Bright; he kept himself together, and he took the poor, degraded-looking girl home to her father. He reproached the latter with the bad example he had set. The father was not too far gone to be lost to all sense of duty and decency. He swore off from the temptations of alcohol in the future, and so, with the promise of a better life, all three cast off their old habits and the story concludes with James Bright producing the wedding ring for his recovered bride-to-be.

Margarita Fischer as the girl, Alice; E. J. Le Saint as the father, and Harry Pollard as the young lover, have very powerful roles. The story is strong and convincing, and should at any rate, act as a deterrent against over-indulgence in strong drinks. Above all, it should act as a warning to parents not to set bad examples to their children.

"THE CHEF'S DOWNFALL"
Imp Release, April 6

Borrowed plumes have led many worthy persons into disaster and frequently into disgrace. Human nature is prone to assume a virtue it has not. Equally so one of the commonest of human weaknesses is the assumption of a worldly dignity to which one is not entitled. When Claude Melnotte, the gardener's son, in the play, "The Lady of Lyons," represented himself as an aristocrat, he was setting an example which would be difficult to obliterate.

Jacques Proudhon was an ambitious chef, who posed as a French Count, in order to obtain the hand of a rich girl, whose father had designs to obtain his daughter a titled husband.

Jacques carried the game through very well by the aid of a disguise and much effrontery, but he reckoned without his host. In his case his host was a fellow menial, a woman servant, with whom the chef had dallied, who at the psychological moment gave Jacques away. The disguise of the bogus count was penetrated and justice was done.

This lively comedy is another vehicle for the rich humor of J. R. Cumpson. In the character of the bogus count, he finds a splendid opportunity for his acting ability. Mr. Cumpson is becoming a greater favorite than ever with imp audiences on Saturday.

On the same reel:

"A CHANGE OF STRIPES"

One of the most fascinating novels by that prolific author Charles Lever is entitled, "A Day's Ride; A Life's Romance." In this book an elderly gentleman goes for a horseback ride and the unexpected happens. It happens so swiftly and so insistently that the whole course of his life is changed by the incidents encountered. In this story we have another illustration of the adage worked upon by Lever that it is the uncertain that happens.

Young Mr. and Mrs. Crosby start out for a day's outing in their automobile. They had not proceeded far in their journey when, much to their dismay their machine broke down for lack of fuel. While Arthur Crosby was absent, endeavoring to find water for the car, an escaped convict appears and at the point of a pistol compels Mrs. Crosby to part with some of her external clothing to him. Enveloped in this he takes possession of the car and proceeds to enjoy a little ride on his own account.

Soon he encounters Arthur Crosby returning with the pail of water, and again the convict's adroitness stands him in good stead. At the point of the pistol he obliges innocent Arthur to change suits with him and he then appears clothed in the garb of civilization, and best of all, in his pocket he finds Arthur's address cards and the keys of his house, to which the convict instantly repairs.

Meanwhile, a reward for the capture of an escaped convict has been publicly posted in the city, and poor Arthur, wearing the suit of one, is in danger of arrest and immurement in prison, until he explains the tragic circumstance in which he finds himself placed.

The convict was hungry and virtually without money, for Arthur had carried little in his clothing; so, when he finds himself in Arthur's house his first act was to make up a package of food and silverware, and then to spy out the land with a view to securing more bounty on his return. But his opportunity and liberty were to be of short duration, for Arthur, accompanied by his friend and some police, jump into an auto and race for the house, arriving just in time to effect the re-capture of the convict.

This story is of the comedy-dramatic order, and the settings are placed in and around Sierra Madre, California. The principal characters are played by Harry Pollard, Miss Crolius and Ben Horning.

"THE DOVE AND THE SERPENT"
Imp Release, April 4

This is a story which is set among picturesque Mexican surroundings. The film will be noticeable on that account as the aim of the producer has been to portray Mexican life, custom and character of to-day. The result is a series of striking pictures which are a departure from pictures now made. In one important respect the picture will be appreciated, as it shows the intimate, or domestic, side of Mexican life.

The story has to do with the love adventures of a Mexican girl, Tortola, who chooses the less worthy of two suitors for her hand. The result is that she suffers the agony commonly ascribed to a dove, or similarly tempered bird or animal, who has the misfortune to fall into the hands of a serpent. The serpent in this case was Luis Arguello. Still, her suffering, great as it was, did not end here. Her chosen lover, Luis, and Pablo, the man she unwisely rejected, are both in the toils of a seductive village "belle," for whose favor the men cut the cards. Luis wins the girl. In this, her great trial, Tortola returns to her father's home, a very bruised bird, indeed.

She is then again taken to his heart, and here, Pablo brings, by force, the faithless lover, but the girl now knows him as he is, and refuses to marry him. The serpent, however, is indifferent to his fate. Being off with the old love, he concludes to be on with the new one, whom he has won by cards. But, alas, on returning to claim his prize, he finds it is an inherently faithless one; she has made a new conquest, and has placed her affections accordingly.

Little Tortola is cured of her infatuation, and this clears the path for her responding to the advances of the true lover, who, regardless of the past, loves her still, and to whom she is finally united.

The story ends with Luis, the serpent, seated on a rock, with bowed head, deserted by all—a fate he richly deserved.

The simplicity of the story does not, perhaps, convey an adequate idea of the ornateness and beauty of the environment in which it is worked out. Local color predominates in every inch of the film. The photography is superb and the acting very fine. The Imp Californian Company supply the characters in this beautiful picture. Harry Pollard, Margarita Fischer, Ben Horning, Miss Bennett, Ed. Lyons and E. J. Le Saint being in the cast.

"THE AGITATOR"
American Release, April 4

While the foreman is absent in the city, with a train load of cattle, the ranchowner, finding himself short of men, employs a new hand. Young, and extremely handsome, with a fine personality, Jack Williams makes quite an impression on the ranchowner's daughters, and he is himself attracted to the older sister.

During his absence, the foreman becomes inflamed with socialistic ideas by attending socialistic gatherings and listening to impassioned speeches by hot-headed men.

He returns to the ranch with his head full of socialism, and finds that the new ranch hand has made great headway with the ranch-owner's daughter, whom he had hoped to win himself. He attempts to force his attentions on her, but finds them unwelcome, and when he carries it to the point of rudeness her father interferes, thereby gaining his foreman's enmity.

In order to retaliate for his suffered grievances he stirs up the cowboys with whiskey and talk gleaned from socialistic meetings.

Under his leadership the boys are ready to fight, and in this dangerous mood the foreman leads a delegation to the ranchman with a demand that he divide his wealth equally among them.

Reasoning and argument do not avail, and the ranchman finds that of all his employees Jack Williams is the only one that remains loyal.

Finding that their demands are not complied with, the cowboys prepare to fight and a desperate battle takes place between the gang and the ranch owner and Jack. The wife and daughters witness the fight, and see the father wounded. Jack leads them all to a pit, where they will be safe and continues the fight alone.

A stray bullet strikes the foreman, and without a leader the cowboys soon see their folly, and hostilities cease. And Jack finds that his brave defense of her father's home has convinced the girl that he could defend one of his own, and they make their plans accordingly.

"CHECKMATE"

American Release, April 8

When jolly, good-natured George Grey invited his old college chum, Jim Blackwell, to Chicago, George, of course, had but little idea of the radical change that the years had made in Jim's nature or the fact that Jim had become decidedly handsome.

So, one day, fresh from the East, Jim blew into George's office, and a grand old reunion took place. George, of course, wanted to show Jim all the sights of his city and, naturally, one of the chief sights was George's best girl. They telephoned to a little French restaurant to hold a table for them. They then repaired to George's rooms, where full dress suits were donned, and the two old friends made straightway for the home of George's best girl, Grace Harcourt.

Here they were received with much pomp by the charming Miss Harcourt, who welcomed them into the library. George did not quite like the way in which Grace looked at Jim. When Jim offered to play, and when Grace stood over him at the piano, and they together sang sentimental songs, George's patience began to ebb. This unfortunate state of mind was further augmented when Grace refused to answer his questions, and became so interested in the conversation of his chum that she seemed obvious to anything else in the room.

After several desperate attempts to introduce himself into the conversation, George seized his hat and coat and fled in dismay and disgust.

Meantime, Jim and Grace progressed nicely. Jim thought of the table reserved at the French restaurant, and insisted that Grace and he carry out the engagement. At the same time George was suddenly seized with an idea. He entered a telegraph office and wired a message to Jim, in care of Cafe Noir.

Jim and Grace, reaching the cafe, were in the midst of a most loving tête-à-tête when the head waiter unexpectedly handed a telegram to Jim. He opened it, gasped in amazement and fainted dead away. Grace, thinking some serious calamity had befallen him, grasped the telegram, and read the following message:

"Twins arrived to-day. Your wife doing well."

"RANCHMAN'S MARATHON"

Charley Wacher and Bob Culver were both madly enraptured with pretty Polly Daniels. They did not take young John Beverly into consideration, but Polly certainly did. When approached on the subject, Polly complained that both Wacher and Culver were much too old—that they were stiff in the joints, aged and infirm. This so wrought up Culver and Wacher that they decided to do a marathon. The one who could run the longest was to receive the hand of the gracious Miss Polly. So they started.

Meantime young John Beverly seized the elusive Polly and rushed her away to the minister. On their return, they met the two marathon runners, and informed them of the marriage.

"OH! LISTEN TO THE BAND"

Lux Release, March 29

A very amusing trick film, involving much humor. The leader of the Blue Hungarian Band is about to be married, and invites all the members of his band to attend the ceremony. The band turned up to a man, but leave their instruments at home. As the instruments also desire to be present at the ceremony they march off in single file. Their passage through the streets is highly amusing. When the bandsmen decided to have a tune, by way of celebrating, they find that their instruments have wandered off. Sitting down in despair, the bandsmen realize how much they love their instruments, but it all ends happily when the cornet, the trombone, the kettle drum, the big drum, and the flute come trooping back with a host more of their comrades.

But, alack! our mighty warrior trips over a humble little rug and bruises his face most rudely upon the kitchen floor. He forgets his bravado, and weeps most cowardly. Little sister forgives her brother's contempt for females, and ministers his every need while in such pain. This brings Jimmie to his proper senses, whereby his views on woman-kind are entirely altered. In fact, they are Heaven's blessing in his estimation ever afterward.

On the same reel:

"A BET AND ITS RESULTS"

Count and Countess d'Artois recently married, while passing through Paris, entertain their friends with a banquet. The pair are ardently in love and shower a deluge of honeymoon kisses on each other. Despite this fact, two dandies from deah ol' London attempt to win the heart of the charming Countess. In order to gain their end, which, by the way, was wagered on by a bet between the two, unbeknown to each other, they bribe the master of ceremonies to become waiters. Their ardent admiration results in spilled dishes down fancy gowns and over dazzling dress-shirt fronts, which finally incites the indignation of all assembled, with the result that the two waiter-dandies are roughly eliminated. Ever hopeful, they seek the room of the Countess and await in the hall for her answer to their proposal. To their deep chagrin she hands out a pair of pumps, assuring them that empty as they are they contain just as much love for them as does her heart. The dandies start to take out their spites on each other, with the result that the remaining hotel guests join in the melee and soon disfigure the insipid countenances of the two ardent Englishmen.

"A NIGHT'S ADVENTURE"
Champion Release, March 25

This is a charming comedy, in which ghosts are supposed to figure, and as a result every participant becomes more or less frightened, and there is consternation that evokes hearty laughs.

Two girl friends accompany a young woman home from the theater, enter the residence, and are surprised to find no one at home. The daughter of the house discovers a note informing her that her parents have gone away to spend the night. The trio is frightened, but resolve to be brave under the circumstances. They retire, all occupying one bed, but before they do so, they whiten their faces to give them an uncanny appearance.

Two burly colored burglars enter the house and collect loot. While they are thus engaged the trio comes downstairs for a pitcher of water and steal in on the burglars. The nocturnal visitors give one look and flee.

The girls are almost crazed with fear, and telephone three male friends to come to their rescue. The young men respond to the call, but are thoroughly frightened to see what appears to be three ghostly forms looking out of an upper window. They go for a policeman, and the quartette breaks into the house with fear and trepidation—to find the girls unconsciously masquerading as ghosts. The matter is explained, and the situations are ludicrous in the extreme.

The comedy is carefully staged, and the photography perfect, making it one of the most welcome comedy offerings of the year.

"ROMANCE OF A GAMBLER"
Nestor Release, March 25

"Jim" Carruthers, favorite nephew and legal heir to the vast estates of John Carruthers, his bachelor uncle has gambling proclivities, and abandons himself to the life of a common gambler. The old man, sorrowing at the boy's reckless course, changes the terms of the will, hoping to bring him back to sober thought and reform.

Ten thousand dollars in cash is duly marked for identification and sent to the erring one, with the stipulation that the same be returned intact at the end of one year from date of its receipt, otherwise the entire fortune shall go to charities. Previous to the receipt of the money and lawyer's advice, Carruthers meets Helen Murray, the young and beautiful daughter of a wealthy mine owner, returning from the East with her aunt as chaperone, and young Gerald Gray, who is coming West to learn the mining business. Carruthers is awakened to a sense of his unworthiness by the presence of the girl's fresh young innocence, and the longing for the love of a good woman possesses him. The arrival of the money and letter of advice from the lawyer is opportune. He has already renounced the life of reckless dissipation. Cards, whiskey—all have been thrown to the four winds, with a vow to reform and become worthy of Helen's love.

Young Gray becomes the business manager for Murray's mining interests, is accepted as Helen's future husband, and is honored and trusted. Secretly, however, the young lover has fallen into bad company and habits, drinking and gambling. He plays heavily and, led on by Jake Smith, a gambling crook, becomes deeply involved. He robs his benefactor and prospective father-in-law, and sinks deeper and deeper into the mire, until he cannot extricate himself. It is here that the heart of the gambler, Carruthers, is revealed in its nobleness of purpose. He has long since learned of the hopelessness of his love for Helen, but in turn is devoted to her happiness. He determines to watch Gerald's course, and lead him from his recklessness. He is watching him in the gambling saloon on the night he loses the last big sum of money taken from his employer's safe. Threatened with exposure, and in despair, Gray hastens from the place to escape the shame, by suicide. He is followed by Carruthers, who prevents the tragedy. Gerald then makes a clean breast of his guilt; Carruthers is shocked, leads him to his own cabin, makes him sign a confession of his deeds, also a pledge to forswear cards and drink, and to be to Helen a faithful husband, devoted to her honor and happiness. Unless Gray fulfills his pledge, Carruthers shall publish the confession of guilt. He gives Gerald the probation money, the return of which means his fortune, telling him to make good his defalcations.

Gerald Gray departs to start a better life and to fulfill his love's vows, while James Carruthers, having sacrificed fortune and lost his love's desire, remains alone with the memories of a brief dream of love's sweet song.

pay envelope. He takes Dan to his own shack to sleep until he is sober, while he puts his own pay into Dan's envelope and hastens to the waiting wife. The child insists upon his staying for supper and afterwards climbs upon his lap and will not allow him to depart. John has given the envelope to Dan's wife, telling her that her husband is still working, but sent home his pay. Dan, after having partly slept off the effects of the liquor, gets up and starts for home. When he arrives home, his wife is sewing, while John is asleep in his chair with the child. Dan sees the picture, so, believing his friend in love with his wife, and she with him, decides to go away and leave them to be happy. He slips out, and writes a note:

"DEAR WIFE:

"I have learned the truth, so I will go away and leave you together. May you both be happy.

"Your unworthy husband,
"DAN."

And slips it under the door.

Twelve years later, we see Mrs. Dan Harding's new home across the Sierras, where she has taken her daughter. The mother has supported herself by sewing. John Webster has come to live not far from them, as he is working on the Dexter Mine. Little Elma's love for him has grown, and they are now happily engaged, greatly to the delight of the girl's mother. Dan Harding, in the meanwhile, has turned over a new page, and is now the owner of the big Dexter mine, although neither Mrs. Harding nor John know of this.

Dan arrives to settle a strike at the mine, and there, to his surprise, meets John. He learns the truth. It was the little daughter and not the mother that John loved. Dan is brought to Mrs. Harding. John is appointed superintendent, and a general reconciliation and forgiveness occurs.

She is reaching the age when a woman must think twice before saying "No!" and then not say it. Eleanor knows her little hook, and makes a grab for Roland. They become engaged.

It so happens that at the hotel which the bachelor calls "Home," comes Mrs. Fair, a fascinating young widow (young widows are always fascinating), her little baby, and maid. The fact of his being engaged does not make Roland less susceptible to feminine charms, and, having seen the widow, he would like to see more of her. The baby appears to object to its being minus a father and, assisted by the maid, lays the foundation for the bachelor's finish.

Roland calls on Eleanor for an auto ride. To his intense astonishment, he discovers the baby sound asleep on one of the limousine's seats; the widow's maid had placed it there by mistake. Eleanor, a la female of the species, promptly jumps at conclusions and accuses her fiancé of being its father. Tableau! The bachelor, not knowing what to do with the baby, takes it to his room.

Meanwhile, the baby's disappearance greatly upsets the widow. Hotel proprietor and detectives come to the rescue, but, alas! despite their united and energetic efforts, baby cannot be found. Bachelor and baby get along famously until the latter's dinner hour arrives; then—— Well, then Roland is obliged to enlist some one's aid. This leads to the re-union of mother and child, and later to the union of widow and bachelor. Baby will no longer be fatherless.

the wife. The signal is flashed and he enters the house, which is in darkness, and gropes around to find the mistress.

Dr. Russell unexpectedly arrives home with a violently insane patient. Marius hears him and seeks safety in concealment, hiding in a cell in the strong ward. The madman is locked in the strong room with him and the gay Lothario is palsied with fear. He attempts to escape, only to attract the attention of the maniac, who grapples with him and a fierce struggle ensues. Dr. Russell has gone to his wife, and they hear the sounds of the battle in the cell. The wife divines the truth and is horror stricken. Dr. Russell extricates Marius, who has been made insane from fright and exhaustion, and brings him into the office. He is surprised to find his casual friend of the hotel in his house in the night, and turns to the wife. She is thoroughly frightened and cannot speak. Marius relieves the tension by producing the letter written him, having only a momentary remembrance of events. The doctor takes the missive, reads it, and learns of the duplicity of his wife, whom he renounces in scathing tones. It is a harsh, but fitting finale to the story—the lover insane, a home wrecked, and the faith of a man in woman destroyed.

WHEN THE HEART CALLS

Reliance Release, April 10

RELIANCE.

Enid Lang is living happily with her husband and little child, Faith. Steve Lyman, an impetuous youth, is madly infatuated with Enid. Enid, however, laughs at his pretensions of love for her and finally in mad desperation at being treated as a boy by the older woman he vows to go away into the woods and live the life of a hermit. He writes a farewell letter to Enid to this effect which Enid shows to her husband. He, heartily sorry for the youth, goes to him and tries to make him see his error. Steve, deeply hurt at this renewed fatherly attitude toward him by the husband of the woman he loves, shows him the door. Soon after he leaves for the mountains and takes up his lonely abode. Years afterward we find him still living his hermit existence and Enid and her husband promising their daughter Faith to take her up into the woods for a prolonged vacation. Up in the woods Faith, following the call of the woods, starts out on a little walk but soon loses her way. She gets further and further away from her family and in the growing darkness stumbles over a cliff where she is found later in an unconscious condition by Steve as he is returning from a hunting trip. Steve carries her to his bungalow, while the family far off are searching for her. When Faith regains consciousness Steve discovers that her mind is a total blank and she can give him no information regarding herself. He nurses her back to health. In the meantime Enid and her husband have become convinced that Faith has been drowned, for they find her hat at the edge of the water and there all signs of her end. Later, when Faith is able to go about in the woods, she meets Walter Farley, a young hunter from the city. Struck with her beauty and childishness he talks with her and she invites him to the house. There he meets Steve and learns that he is not her father but her temporary guardian. He suggests that Faith should be taken back to the city and then Steve tells him that he thinks she is the daughter of Enid as he found a locket around her neck containing Enid's picture. Walter sends a telegram to Enid and shortly follows with Faith, leaving Steve alone in his misery fully awake to the fact that he has fallen deeply in love with the girl. An operation brings Faith back to her normal self and Walter is rejected when he presses his suit. She asks her parents to take her back up into the mountains where she can thank the man that saved her life and they finally agree. When they reach Steve's home he is not there and Faith leaves them in the house and goes in search of him. She finds him on the cliffs looking out over the water and there it is that they waken to the call of their hearts and hand in hand return to the bungalow and her family learns that the hermit has at last found his mate.

AN OPPORTUNE BURGLAR

Reliance Release, April 13

Smithson, an elderly stock broker, marries his stenographer. A little later Smithson's nephew, of whom he is guardian, arrives home from college and is introduced to his uncle's wife. The nephew promptly falls in love with his uncle's young wife and she in turn takes quite a fancy to him, having only married Smithson because she wanted a home and money. The attachment between the two begins to assume serious proportions when the uncle notices it and forbids the nephew the house. The nephew, seizing that evening as a last chance to say good-bye to the girl, returns and happily finds the uncle out. While she is at the door admitting him a burglar enters, and as they enter the room hides behind the curtains. The uncle is heard returning and the boy jumps back of the curtains in front of a rather spacious alcove. The two remain hidden, both fearing to make a noise, especially the nephew, for he is in danger now from two different sources. The uncle discovers the boy's smouldering cigarette and accuses his wife of hiding the boy somewhere. Not satisfied with her silence he starts for the alcove when the burglar jumps out. Smithson grapples with the burglar and is shot in the arm, the burglar escaping. The girl in that moment realizes all that her husband is to her and supporting him in her arms takes him out of the room. After tenderly attending him she returns to the room where the boy attempts to take her in his arms. She repulses him and in a fury of anger at his presuming to think she could ever be the same to him after his showing such a yellow streak tells him to get out. The uncle meanwhile has entered from the rear, his arm bound heavily in linen, and hears the whole conversation.

After the boy is gone the girl sinks down in a chair, sobbing, but her husband comes over to her and tells her he knows all and that there is nothing to forgive and with his free arm draws her to him.

THE STAR OF THE SIDE SHOW

Thanhouser Release, April 2

Her parents were humble peasants, and were fond of her when she was a baby, for they believed she would grow up to be a beautiful woman and make a good match. The trouble was she didn't grow up. When she was nineteen she was no bigger than a child of six, and the parents hitterly lamented the fact.

Naturally they were overjoyed when an offer for their daughter's hand was made hy another midget who lived in the same little village. To their astonishment and anger, the girl refused to entertain it, declaring the husband she chose would have to he a man of whom she could he proud.

Her home life was most unhappy after that, and the entire family rejoiced when a showman from the United States arrived and offered what seemed big money if she would join his "Congress of Freaks," which was quite an institution in America. And the girl went gladly.

In her strange new life, she found many things to wonder at, and one object to admire, to wit, the loveliest, biggest, jolliest giant she had ever dreamed of. Naturally she fell deeply in love with him, but he never even suspected it. The reason was that his giantly affections were all expended on the glorious snake charmer, whom he hoped to make his hride some day.

The midget, who thought her affections were returned, was disillusioned, and her romance shattered. Then the little man from across the sea crossed to America, and renewed his suit. She was won by his devotion, and accepted him, realizing that they would be happy, far happier than she would have heen with the giant.

It is hard enough for a woman to manage an ordinary man, hut how can she hope to control a big hulking hushand, when one snort of disapproval hy him will blow her and her orders to the four winds of Heaven?

THE GIRL OF THE GROVE

Thanhouser Release, April 5

The girl was young, pretty, and also a good husiness woman. When her father died, she took up the reins of management and ran an orange grove with successful results. Her mother, who lived with her, was proud of the self-reliant girl, and their life was peaceful and happy.

Her capable hands were so husy, making a modest fortune, that she had no time to think of love. One day, however, "the prince" appeared. He was a tourist from the North, good-looking, well dressed, and of gentlemanly manners. It was love at first sight on both sides, and the girl dreamed of a happy home with the man she loved.

Then the awakening came. She learned that the man had a wife, an invalid and a cripple. The man did not tell her; the news was broken to her by accident. Self-reliant people suffer the most when sorrow comes, it is said, and the girl was no exception to the rule. Life had become hitter to her, and in a moment of weakness she decided to end it all, and wandered down to the sea.

Looking around to note if she was observed, she was just in time to see another woman leap overhoard. The girl forgot her own trouhles, jumped into the water, and saved the unfortunate. After she had brought her ashore and revived her, she recognized the unhappy one as the wife who was the harrier hetween herself and the man.

The wife did not know her rescuer, but in gratitude told her story, of physical suffering, of neglect and coldness that had made her determined to seek rest in the grave. The girl listened, and hreathed a silent prayer of thankfulness for her romance was blasted, and she could see clearly that the man was not worth any sacrifice. So the thought of self-destruction passed away, never again to return.

The self-reliant girl pitied the poor weak woman, and induced her to make her home with her. There later the girl received a letter from the man, telling of the death of "a rich relative" which, he explained, made their marriage possible. He added that he would call that afternoon to discuss the date of their marriage.

The man was promptly on hand. The girl met him, and led him through the grove to the house. Then she stepped aside and pointed to a woman asleep in an invalid's chair. The man looked and recognized the wife he thought dead.

"I saved her life," the girl whispered, "your neglect and hrutality drove her to attempt suicide. My intention is to see that her remaining days are happy. You have no part in the life of either of us. Go, and never return."

The man, touched for once, made no comment, hut departed. The wife awoke and sleepily asked the girl if they had had a visitor.

"No one that either of us knows or ever will know," was the reply. "Go to sleep again, dear, and awake to a happier future. You are living in an Adamless Eden now," and the wife, with a half-sleepy smile of comprehension, dozed off again, while the girl watched her with a look of love and pity.

For even if you are capable and self-reliant, it is hard to realize that your idol has feet of clay and that the days of romance are over for you forever.

KID CANFIELD, THE REFORMED GAMBLER

Champion Release, April 1

The history of this man is as remarkable in many ways as that of the most notable men of the century. This would seem a large assertion to make, but the brief depiction of his life, as here set forth, will hear us out, that our statement is most justifiable. The filming of the story is most graphically done, and is entirely in keeping with the deep gravity of the subject. Its educational value is unquestioned; and the moral influence which it is hound to exert on the youth of our land, makes it preeminently, in this respect, the film story par excellence of the season.

Learning the gamhler's art as a hoy, he practiced it on his younger brother and sister. This aroused his father to a righteous indignation, the culmination of which was the driving of the hoy out into the world. He started his career in a Western town, using his art with such adeptness as to make his reputation, as a card shark and Monteman, notorious throughout that section. Ten years later, he bloomed forth as the keeper of one of the most widely known gambling dens in the country. In this hell of infamy every device of the damnable profession was used.

The paraphernalia in evidence in this haunt of vice exerted its fascination on the youth and the adult alike, drawing them, with devilish certitude, to the consuming flame of their own destruction! Into this mad vortex of the human passions came a youth. He was clever, and luck was with him; then the Kid marked him as a victim, to be fleeced and shorn, to be plucked and scorched! We behold the hellish apparatus secretly prepared, and we see the fiendish operations carried out to their horrihle conclusion. Black despair) overtakes the miserable youth, and self-destruction is the penalty he pays for his folly.

Clutched in the hand of the lifeless victim was a photograph. Canfield, bold and callous, loosened the fingers of the dead youth; but his eye falling on the picture bulged with horror. The face was that of his mother! The boy, cold and stiff, whose young life was wiped out so cruelly, was his own brother! Recovering from the terrible realization that he was, indeed, a fratricide, the notorious Canfield registered a solemn oath before high heaven to forsake his evil ways and devote his entire life to the reclamation, in some degree, of the youth of the land he had corrupted.

Thus comes the grand finale to this o'er true tale. Here we behold, in the second reel, the exposition and correct manner of manipulation of the various devices used by the gambling profession. This is a most fascinating part of the subject, morally, educational and instructive, in the sense of telling us and warning us of the pitfalls and slimy traps of the gilded dens of vice which abound around us.

THE LIGHTED CANDLE
Majestic Release, March 31

John Bennet, a hustling young American, is engaged in the dangerous business of manufacturing high explosives. He needs more money to extend his business and this forces him to seek financial aid of Wm. Stone, the moneyed power of the town wherein John's factory is situated. Mr. Stone advances him the required amount, but exacts a bill of sale of the business in case of the non-payment of the loan.

John Bennet has a little niece about five years old with whom the financier, Mr. Stone, and his daughter Edith are greatly fascinated. Through this friendship for the child a stronger friendship is springing up between John and Edith. John's early years had been spent entirely in building up his business and beyond the love for his older sister and little niece the gentle sex has not entered his life.

At the time the payment of the note is due, John finds himself unable to pay the full amount and approaches Mr. Stone for an extension of time. This is flatly refused and in desperation John tells his sister and she sacrifices the family jewels for the raising of the money. John at once proceeds to the office of the financier, Mr. Stone, and pays this money and receives a receipt. The clerk, being more occupied with a flirtation across the street than with business, credits the money to the wrong account, and later on through more negligence is discharged by his employer.

John takes his receipt back to his own office, where his little niece is playing on the floor with a doll given to her by Edith Stone. At this moment she is doing the doll's hair up in curl papers. Bennet opens his safe and taking out his receipt file, opens it and places the receipt just obtained in the box, but as fate would have it, his attention is distracted at this moment by the foreman of his factory who comes in and speaks to him, and a draught from the window blows the receipt out of the box and it falls on the floor where his little niece is playing. She takes up the receipt and uses it for a curl paper for her dollie's hair. John, having finished talking to the foreman, turns, locks the box and puts it back in the safe, knowing nothing of the loss of the receipt.

John then notices his little niece playing with the doll and, knowing she obtained this doll from Edith, the daughter of the man whom he considered had treated him so cruelly, he takes it from her and throws it up on top of the safe and tells the child to go home, not wishing her to receive any presents from either Mr. Stone or his family.

Later Mr. Stone brings the sheriff to the factory to take possession on account of the non-payment of the note. John at once claims that he has paid the money, goes to the safe, gets out the box to show them the receipt, and of course he cannot find it, with the result that the law compels him to give up his business. John is therefore deprived of his plant and left bitter at heart.

Insane from anger at losing all by a trick as he believes, John determines that another man shall not profit by the foreclosure. He lights a candle and places it in the magazine room. He returns to his home to be told by his sister that Edith Stone has called upon his little niece, found her crying because of the loss of her doll, and learning that it had been left at the office of the powder mill volunteers to go back with her and get it, and accompanied by Mr. Stone, who was with Edith, they do so.

The cold sweat starts out on John as he realizes the frightful peril of his little niece and also realizes that it will mean not only Stone's death but also Edith's—where he contemplated destroying an empty plant, three precious lives will be lost at the same moment.

Everything seemed to fight against him in his headlong flight to reach the lighted candle in time, but in time he does reach it, just as the wick is burning down to the explosive, while in the office his little niece, laughingly undoing her doll's curl papers, finds and shows to Edith and Stone a paper which they realize is the lost receipt. John stumbles in from the magazine room to be met by the news of the recovery of the receipt and Stone's apology and reparation for the error of his careless clerk. Edith also offers reparation of a still more gratifying nature to the happy John.

KEEP QUIET
Majestic Release, April 2

James Carson is annoyed by an over-musical cook who accompanies her work, especially in the early morning hours, by her loud singing. Unable to sleep, he arises in a rage and descends to the dining room and discharges Mary despite the protests of his wife, who declares that only a deaf and dumb servant will satisfy him.

It so happens that Mary's mother and father bring back the weekly wash about this time, so Bridget, Mary's mother, proposes that she take Mary's place. Not being deaf and dumb, she promises Mrs. Carson to assume those infirmities and is at once installed as the deaf and dumb cook, and Mary departs with her father, who is an iceman.

In the meantime, James has gone to an employment agency and secures a Chinaman who passes himself off as deaf and dumb. Upon returning home with John, the Chinaman, he finds that his wife has engaged a servant, and not wishing to give up his find, Bridget and John Chinaman are installed in the kitchen as co-laborers.

The Irish and Chinese combination don't get along well and create a lot of disturbance which finally ends with Bridget throwing a custard pie in John's face. The much disturbed Mr. Carson and his frau rush into the kitchen and separate the combatants. James Carson takes John to another room, while Bridget is left alone in the kitchen with Mrs. Carson and explains to her what has happened. Mr. Carson, by chance, overhears this and thus becomes aware of the deceit being practiced in regard to Bridget being deaf and dumb. Thinking he will get even with his wife, he proposes to John that he make love to Bridget and get her so wrought up that she will finally speak and show the deception. This John at once proceeds to do, but unfortunately for him, just as he has Bridget in a fond embrace, her husband, the iceman, enters with a cake of ice. Misconstruing the situation, the iceman at once begins to chastise John and John manages to escape with his life by the intervention of Mr. Carson and his wife.

Explanation follows, and Bridget and John are sent on their way. It happens at this moment that Mary, their former musical cook, returns for some of her belongings and she is eagerly grabbed by James Carson and reinstalled as queen of the kitchen.

The next morning finds Mary again lighting the fire and making coffee to musical accompaniments. James Carson rises from his pillow, at first much disturbed at being aroused, but remembering his previous day's experience with the "so-called" deaf and dumb servants he congratulates himself upon being so lucky and sinks back with a contented smile.

LOVE'S FOUR STONE WALLS
Rex Release, March 28

When thoughts that were buried are born again,
When hopes that were dead have arisen,
In that Certain-but-God-Knows-When Time — ah, then
There are souls will be found in Love's Prison.

And sometimes love is a prison, and Cupid a stern warden; and the stripes are worn on the soul. They who have gone down into the depths and crawled through the darkness; they who have stumbled in shallow places—they know that destiny is often a woman's eyes, that a woman's face is often fate. And—we know that love's refuge is often a barred cage.

He loved, and was loved by the girl—but her father was a broker, and Wall street has its own patented way of supplying the climax for a romance. Wall street consummated her father's downfall, and in despair and despond he realized that he had but one means to survive the blow, to borrow sufficient money from his banker to hush the stentorian voice of debt.

Funny world!—the banker loved the girl, too; and because Wall street was in his veins and money in his heart, he looked upon love as a commercial commodity, to be bartered and bought in shares. So he offered to lend the money if he could marry the girl, and the father, not knowing the girl's heart and the love it sheltered, took the money!

The girl was told; she looked over the yawning chasm of impending poverty, and saw the darkness in the depths; she saw the death of her father's honor, and the ghost of his respect among men—so she promised to marry the man. Perhaps the banker didn't know she loved another; perhaps he did.

The other tried to forget, and forgot everything but her. From earth's hollow shadows he looked up at the stars, and there he saw her eyes. He looked into the sea, turbulent as life, and he heard the ripple of her laughter. He looked into his soul, and there he saw her face. Constantly with him was the lure, the call of the woman, the whisper of the destiny that claimed him.

So when her husband advertised for a secretary he applied, and got the position. And she saw him, and looked upon his face, and into his heart, and saw there written the reason for his coming.

It happened a few days later. The agent of fate, impulse, led his feet into her room, compelled his arms to draw her to himself, urged his lips to find hers; and then, the agent's work accomplished, fate herself stepped in, bringing the husband with her. In a flash it occurred to him; to save the woman's honor and preserve her secret he snatched the pearls from her neck and stood before them a confessed thief.

Four stone walls, in a prison built by love!

THE LIGHT ON THE WAY
Rex Release, March 31

There was Mikey O'Donovan, whose stubby little hands were always shoved way down into the pockets of his tattered trousers, with that defiant air which made patent the fact that he would one day be a policeman; there was Gretchen Miller, whose golden hair and creamy skin were the envy of the other feminine members of the class and the objects of wholesale admiration from the male contingent; and little Mary Burke, the cripple, in whose wistful, tiny face one could read the story of suffering and the record of stoic courage, and through whose eyes, despite her affliction, shone the sunbeam reflection of a happy soul; and there was Abie Rahinowitz, who always illustrated his mathematical problems by such objects as coats, trousers and suspenders and who predicted every fire in the neighborhood by at least a week; and thin Annie Brown, who looked as though she was always cold and always hungry—because she was. And Marion Leonard—who it isn't necessary to explain, was the teacher of this group of children of the tenements—loved them, loved them with a mother-love and a sister-love and the warm love of suffering humankind.

When their mouths hungered, she gave them food. When they were ill and their parents' destitution too great to help pay the doctor's fee, she brought the doctor and bought the medicine. When they shivered with the cold of a cold world, she gave them the warmth of her love and bought them heat. "The gift without the giver is bare." Lowell wrote; but she gave more of herself than the first law of nature recommended. The kids were her life, and the schoolroom her world. And as for the kids—they never could understand their Sunday school teaching that God was in man's image—they thought God was their teacher.

"Nothing from nothing leaves nothing," the class learned one day; and another day Miss Leonard learned the very lesson, emphasized by a sterner teacher, life. "Nothing from nothing leaves nothing"—so Miss Leonard couldn't pay her rent.

The landlady called and stated her wrongs to the principal, and Miss Leonard was told to go. It broke her heart to leave those she loved, and it killed her a little. She stretched forth her arms to the empty seats, and her soul spoke to the souls of the absent children. "I must leave you," it said, "I must leave you because I loved you. I hope your new teacher loves you and is kind to you. But if she isn't, remember me, please, kiddies, think of me—" and then—well, she was a woman and she had the right to cry.

The next morning the kids found that the world was a dark and dreary void. They went to the principal, and with warm tears in their eyes begged to have their saviour back. They told him all she had done for them—and the principal understood.

And the kids went back to their room with joy in their hearts and Miss Leonard in their midst.

THE JOY RIDE

Powers Release, April 2

Mary was possessed by one idea; she longed to pose as a lady. Unfortunately for Mary, she was only Mrs. Tadbury's maid of all work and therefore her ambition seemed hopeless.

Finally, however, the opportunity unfolded itself for the maid to impersonate her mistress and Mary was not one bit slow in grasping it. She took quite a little social whirl, went on a joy ride with a wealthy clubman and succeeded in weaving a web of circumstantial evidence around poor Mrs. Tadbury that came nearly causing a divorce suit in the Tadbury household. The wealthy clubman, Charles Webb, also came in for his share of trouble, receiving some very rough treatment at the hands of the irate Mr. Tadbury. Mary came to grief, at last, and realized the full meaning of the text, "Pride goeth before a fall and vanity before destruction."

NEWARK INDUSTRIAL EXPOSITION

Newark is to hold a great industrial exposition under the auspices of the Board of Trade, May 13th to 25th, to accelerate the industrial, commercial and educational interests of the city. "Do it for Newark!" is the spirit that dominates all of the elaborate preparations made for this big civic undertaking. Displays will be made in the First Regiment Armory and grounds, the building being one of the largest and best adapted to the exhibition purposes in the United States.

It is claimed that one hundred thousand different articles are manufactured in the three thousand shops of the Newark industrial district, the diversity being proportionately greater than that of any other manufacturing district in the country.

Not only will the products of Newark's factories be shown, but also the precesses of manufacture. There will be many special features of an entertaining and educational nature, including a series of lectures on the industrial development and opportunities of Greater Newark. The committee announces that through the medium of the Exposition it wishes to draw the attention of the nation to the fact that Newark is now the fourteenth city of the country in population and the eleventh in manufacturing, and that it is enjoying a period of greater prosperity than ever before in its history.

The committees in charge of the project number three hundred representative citizens of the Newark industrial district, including Chairman Curtis R. Burnett, who is president of the Board of Trade; Thomas A. Edison, ex-Governor Franklin Murphy, Forrest F. Dryden, president of the Prudential Insurance Company; Frederick Frelinghuysen, president of the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company; Hon. Thomas N. McCarter, president of the Public Service Corporation of Newark, and the leaders in many industries whose total capital exceeds $200,000,000.

7000 Columbia Dealers

are ready to deliver this new Grafonola with 12 double-disc records (24 selections) subject to three days' free trial, for $59 cash.

Or for the same price at $7 down and $5 a month, no interest, no extras.

This is the Columbia Grafonola "Favorite," the first Grafonola ever offered at its price or anywhere near it. We believe it is the best that can be constructed and sold at its price, or near it. It is the first instrument of the enclosed type offered at anything like its price, capable of all the tonal quality of the $200 instruments.

The 24 selections on the 12 double-disc records include the famous "Rigoletto" Quartette and also the splendid "Lucia" Sextette, for which two selections alone many talking machine owners have had to pay $13. Or your own selection of records will be supplied. (Record album extra, 10-inch, $1.50, 12-inch, $1.75.)

The Columbia Grafonola "Favorite" is a notable combination of high quality and low price. The mechanism is fully cabineted, the reproducer operating beneath the lid, and the sound waves being led through the tone-arm to the tone-chamber where they are greatly amplified and then thrown out through the opening, subject to reduction at your will by the partial or complete closing of the small doors. The cabinet work is of the highest possible craftsmanship, the wood used being either selected grain quarter-sawn oak, or strongly marked genuine mahogany, hand polished. No finer finish is applied to a thousand dollar piano. The turntable is revolved by a powerful triple spring motor, which plays three records at one winding and may be rewound while running. The operation of the motor is absolutely silent, and its speed is regulated on a graduated dial. "Hearing is believing"—and trying is proving. Don't let this day get by before you take action. This is the objective point we have been working toward for four years—and the only mistake you can make is the missing of it! Don't miss it—seize it!

If you own a talking machine of the enclosed type—whatever make—it's full time you knew the Columbia Double-Disc Record guarantee: "We guarantee to every purchaser of Columbia Double-Disc Records that the material used in their composition is of better quality, finer surface and more durable texture than that entering into the manufacture of disc records of any other make, regardless of their cost. We further guarantee that their reproducing qualities are superior to those of any other disc records on the market and that their life is longer than that of any other disc record under any name or any price."

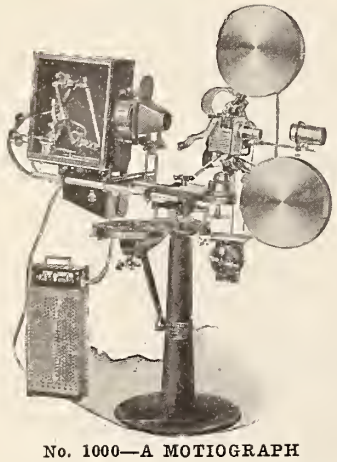
Sound, Substantial Reasons for the Pre-eminent Position of

THE MOTIOGRAPH



No. 1000—A MOTIOGRAPH

What is the reason of that mysterious enthusiasm which makes every one speak in high praise of the MOTIOGRAPH?

What peculiar qualities does it possess, which impel the exhibitor to dismiss the suggestion that othere are "as good?"

We can trace the cause by taking, as an example, one little fact: Every part and every screw is interchangeable with every other part and every other screw.

Accurate dimensions in MOTIOGRAPH parts means elimination of friction and extraordinary ease of operation—besides assuring freedom from worry and "up-keep" expense.

The Photoplay Magazine

devoted exclusively to INDEPENDENT PICTURES and running stories in each issue from the best films of the month's releases, also 16 pages of photos of Independent players on the very best paper, suitable for framing. Sample copy free to INDEPENDENT EXHIBITORS.

This magazine sells for 10c. a copy, and we have had some exhibitors sell as many as 150 copies a month. Rate to exhibitors 6c. per copy, postage prepaid, all unsold copies returnable. This is the only standard magazine in the world devoted exclusively to Independent pictures and the handsomest 10c. magazine published.

Do not be misled into placing anything on sale in your theatre that will advertise Licensed pictures. The reason of this is—you cannot consistently handle anything that deals with both Independent and Licensed unless you want to advertise your competitor, the Licensed Exhibitor. It does not take much convincing to see this.

Send your order now and we will send you 10 copies and will not ask you to pay for them in advance. All we ask is that you send us our share after you sell the magazine. Then if you fail to sell them they are fully returnable to us. Send us your order now for the April number, as we are selling out every month. Tear off the attached coupon and mail today.

IN SELF-DEFENSE

The Majestic Motion Picture Company Voluntarily Withdraws From

and CEASES FURTHER AFFILIATION WITH the MOTION PICTURE DISTRIBUTING AND SALES COMPANY, and will sell its product direct to any and all Independent exchanges which are willing to assert THEIR REAL INDEPENDENCE!

The penalty of 2 cents a foot commission exacted by the Sales Company from the Majestic Company has reached such proportions that for many weeks past we have paid them approximately $1,000 a week. Common sense will tell everybody that nobody could continue under such extortion.

Of all the Independent manufacturers marketing through the Sales Company, the Majestic alone was called upon to pay this enormous bounty.

If the Independent Exchanges had derived any financial benefit from this impossible situation, we would not mind it so much, but we understand that every cent of this bountiful fee was placed in a fund which lessened each manufacturer's contribution to the legal controversy with the Motion Picture Patents Company.

Whatever profits may arise from the continued efforts of this company, justly belong to the company itself, and may be distributed any way it disposes and with that in mind, we make the following proposition to all Independent Exchanges:

OUR PROPOSITION TO ALL EXCHANGES!

Two cents of every ten cents paid by any and all exchanges for Majestic pictures went to the benefit of the Sales Company. We now are willing to share that two cents a foot with all exchanges in the following manner—shipping the releases to the exchanges direct.

Our price will be 10 cents a foot to any exchange buying either Tuesday or Sunday release.

A discount of 10 per cent will be given to any and all single exchanges which buy both the Tuesday and Sunday releases.

This 10 per cent cannot be obtained by one exchange in one city buying one release and a branch exchange in another city buying the other release. Each exchange must stand alone.

ALL SHIPMENTS TO BE MADE ON A CASH BASIS

THE FIRST RELEASE ON THE DIRECT BASIS WILL BE SUNDAY, MARCH 31st—"THE LIGHTED CANDLE"—a drama with an intensely thrilling climax.

ALL POSTERS WILL BE 5 CENTS EACH, AND THEY WILL BE ARTISTIC ONES

NOW ABOUT MAJESTIC PICTURES:

The exhibitors throughout the country have emphasized their appreciation of the quality of Majestic pictures by their continued demand—their letters to us prove conclusively that our pictures are the favored ones. We will hold that confidence for all time because we will now spend more money than ever, to attain all that is perfection in story, producing, acting and photography.

Our ALL STAR STOCK COMPANY is composed of some of the greatest favorites in the motion picture business. We will not stop there but will secure more of the favorites from time to time until the Majestic will be the most popular picture in the industry.

EXCHANGE MAN'S OPPORTUNITY!

We cannot figure how any Independent exchange owner can fail to take advantage of the liberal offer of the Majestic—it is fair; it is mutual; and it is a forerunner of the exchange owner's opportunities to save and make some money for himself. Order TWO MAJESTICS EACH WEEK DIRECT FROM THE MAJESTIC COMPANY, and save 10 PER CENT ON THE PRICE YOU ARE NOW PAYING.

WHERE THE EXHIBITOR COMES IN!

If his exchange purchases TWO MAJESTICS EACH WEEK, he will be assured of at least two clean, wholesome pictures each week—and will be sure of at least two good paying days each week.

THE EXCHANGE PROFITS! THE EXHIBITOR PROFITS! THE MAJESTIC PROFITS!

LET THE EXHIBITORS AND THE EXCHANGES DO THEIR WORK AND THE MAJESTIC WILL NOT FAIL THEM

DEATH OF JAMES P. CHALMERS

(Editor Moving Picture World)

It was quite a shock to us, when, first thing on arriving at our office Wednesday morning, March 27th, we found a wire informing us that James P. Chalmers had been accidently killed at the Dayton convention of the Ohio Exhibitors' League. We could hardly realize the news was true, until we called up authoritative sources and received confirmation of the sad news. Quite a feeling of gloom must have been spread over the buoyant spirits of the Exhibitors at Dayton, and we can fully sympathize with those who witnessed the sad accident, and the anxiety attendant upon the question, "Will he recover, or will he pass beyond?" during the time he hovered on the borderland. On another page of this issue will be found the facts of the accident.

To his relatives we offer our sincere sympathies. It has been our province to know J. P. Chalmers better then anyone else in the industry. We have known him in many characters. We knew of him in his capacity of editor to several photographic papers, "The Camera and Darkroom," etc., the last of which when we became fully acquainted with him, was the "American Amateur Photographer," while this was published at the offices of the Scientific American. It was here that we formed our partnership with him. It was here that we went to him with our baby, "The Moving Picture World," and explained to him our aims and expectations; we wished to bring out a paper that should be world wide in its scope, speaking and teaching the uplifting of the Cinematograph Art; a paper of educational value to every school and college where moving pictures might be taken or projected.

Whatever J. P. Chalmers and we had in common for the first fifteen months of our partnership, nothing but the pleasantest feelings are entertained for that period of time. We can only now express our sincere feeling of regret and sorrow that he was snatched so suddenly from our midst, leaving unfinished many projects that he had in his mind. At this time all we can think and say is "Requiescat in Pace."

ADVANCEMENT OF CINEMATOGRAPHY

HOW well our readers, with us, remember the time, and only a very short period ago, when scarcely a paper in this wonderful land of ours had a good word to say on cinematography. How we chafed under the collar at the yoke the great dailies and weeklies laid upon us. How we cried out in the agony of our soul, if they cannot speak any good of us, why do they say so many damaging things? We admitted our failings, but we knew there was wonderful good in us as a moving picture film; we knew that the time would come, and oftentimes said in these columns, that the time would arrive when the papers that cavilled and berated us would not have too much to say in our praise. We were true prophets, and we consider that a little glory is due us for the vast strides made in the change of opinion of the press of our land. It is a true axiom, "the pen is mightier than the sword," and when we realize the vast number of papers, magazines and scientific journals that quote from the Moving Picture News, we are more than pleased at the success of our little endeavors to uplift the industry. There is scarcely a paper to-day but what has either a moving picture column or some item wherein they laudate and uphold the advance of the art, and on behalf of our readers we thank the various scientific, educational and even medical journals that are taking up the cause of cinematography. Bobbie Burns said:

"Oh, wad some power the giftie gie us,
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

We want to show from special quotations and editorials "how those who came to curse remain to bless." The following, taken from the Medical Fortnightly, a paper published in St. Louis, shows a trend in the right direction:

CIVIC HYGIENE AND THE MOVING PICTURE SHOW

It seems that the moving picture show is being discovered as a means to the accomplishment of good other than simple entertainment. During its early days, before the time of regulation, much was to be said in condemnation of these institutions; they were miserably ventilated, miserably seated and presented pictures which were often objectionable for one reason or another. The municipalities have issued orders as to seating, ventilation and fire protection which are now largely an accomplished fact, and a national censorship has eliminated all the more objectionable subjects. Indianapolis alone, in so far as we have learned, has discovered that darkness is not essential to these shows, that slight dimming of the room makes the pictures quite as clear as is necessary. In Indianapolis there are no dark shows and other cities should follow the example.

In the matter of pictures instructive subjects are becoming more frequent. Thousands upon thousands of Americans are going to these shows every day, the audiences are made up largely of the poor and those in moderate circumstances, but with a goodly sprinkling of wealth and position, who find growing satisfaction in this form of entertainment. Through no other agency can so large audiences be reached. If the pictures are well done, no other means of communication more graphically tells the story which it is wished to impress. Medical and sanitary subjects have as yet been few and not overly well done, but the start should be welcomed and a development of this means of reaching the people in an important work encouraged. Recently local shows used a reel on a day of a visiting nurse which was excellently done and which told its story without words and to people of various tongues. Such a picture run in a great city makes a welcome for visiting nurses in places where they are most needed and where they might gain admission with difficulty but for the introduction. At present there is running in this city a reel on garbage disposal in New York City which is important in the awakening of public interest in clean cities. Tuberculosis has been presented, but not as it properly should be as yet. Many subjects immediately suggest themselves which should be used in this connection. We believe that any one of the several companies would gladly undertake such work were they approached by organizations properly authorized and furnished with such essentials as each subject requires. We are positive that audiences would welcome such pictures as a relief from the surfeit of cowboys and Indians.

The picture show has come to stay. It should be utilized for good in every way that is possible, for it certainly reaches the people. (How's this, Editor M. P. N.?)

Following the above we take another clipping from the New York World which is very gratifying as showing the progress and trend of thought from the press:

POSING FOR POSTERITY

Moving pictures of the burial of the battleship Maine, which took place off the Island of Cuba Saturday, March 16, have arrived in this city and are already developed and ready to be shown to the public.

Wonderful vividness the moving picture promises to lend to History! The preservation of films of special public interest begins to be already a matter for the Government to consider. There is no reason why our grandchildren and great-grandchildren a hundred years hence should not see faithful reproductions of Mr. Taft signing the Statehood Bill for Arizona and New Mexico, the Durbar of King George the Fifth, this series of views showing the last chapter in the story of the Maine, and even more important events.

What would we not give to-day for a moving picture of the signing of the Declaration of Independence? Or of Washington taking leave of his officers? Or of Lincoln at Gettysburg? Is it not, after all, our duty carefully to record and preserve as archives such moving pictures of contemporary scenes and public persons as may have first-rate interest for posterity?

The opening of the Panama Canal, for example, will be one of the great world events of all time. Thanks to the moving picture camera, with what vivacity and lifelike completeness may we not hand on the scenes of that great inauguration to future generations! Will not cities, libraries and schools all over the world desire such records? The making of films of this class should be made an organized official undertaking and their preservation a public charge.

It is given to some to sow what they reap, and to others that they pass away before the reaping time comes, but to us the seed we have so persistently sown during the past six years is maturing to a wonderfully good harvest, and when the gentlemen of the press exploit the beauties of the Cinematograph Art we feel the time has fully arrived when everything that is best and most elevating should be given to the people.

THE OHIO EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE CONVENTION

By William Lord Wright
(Exclusive to The Moving Picture News)

Dayton, Ohio, March 27.—With flags flying from almost every building in the prettiest inland city in Ohio, the Sixth Annual Convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Ohio convened here this morning, as a thing of beauty and a joy for ever.

Not the least noteworthy event was the presence of Mr. Carl Laemmle, head of the Imps Film Company, of New York City, and indomitable foe of the Motion Picture Patents Company.

The second best thing of the convention which opened so auspiciously was the interest evinced in the advertising campaign instituted by the Moving Picture News. Every exhibitor attending the convention grabbed a copy of the News with self evident pleasure, and many expressed their regrets that Editor Alfred H. Saunders could not be present in person.

Mr. Carl Laemmle, in an exclusive interview granted to Mr. R. P. Stoddard, of the Cleveland Leader and the News representative, hit from the shoulder on matters of intense interest to cinematography.

It was the first Exhibitors' League meeting that this power of independent picturedom ever attended. He was the cynosure of all eyes, and the object of popular attention. Mr. Laemmle said:

"I congratulate the Ohio exhibitors in getting together, and also on the fact that it is not only an Ohio convention, but in reality a national convention.

"As every one knows, I started in business as an exhibitor and can sympathize with their views. Good pictures are an uplift to the industries. To-day the manufacturer cannot exist without the support of the exhibitors. The manufacturers depend upon the exhibitors for information.

"I believe exhibitors should be independent and exercise the right of selecting their own pictures. It is to the Exhibitors' Association that we must look for the exercise of the best influence in the motion picture business. It should be the business of the State and National Associations to carefully watch all legislation.

"The Moving Picture Distributing and Sales Company is deserving of staunch support. Independence means a whole lot. It can influence both patrons and public. I think the exhibitor should do more to influence exchanges to secure the very best pictures to be had.

Regarding the alleged investigation by Uncle Sam of the trust propensities of the licensed forces, Mr. Laemmle said:

"This investigation does not affect the Independents. We don't take the attitude of the patents company, in our mind the patents have a monopoly on. We attend to our own business, and perhaps a little more.

"The Independent output has improved a hundred per cent. The competition between Independent companies has improved quality.

"The moving picture is going to educate millions of people who never before attended a theater of any kind.

"I never tire of seeing moving pictures, and eventually the big houses will educate the people in the industry as well as the smaller theatres.

"I understand Paul J. Rainey has sold an Independent concern his African pictures at an enormous price. Rainey is a Cleveland millionaire, who spends his leisure time in hunting big game on the Dark Continent. These pictures will run 5,000 feet," said Mr. Laemmle.

"To cater to the demand for more length film drama, we are now figuring on 2,000 and 3,000 feet of picture film regularly. I might say that I have purchased the Esta Wielson negative in Europe. The picture was a great success in Europe, and will run about 2,000 feet."

Mr. Laemmle had some other statements which he confided to Messrs. Stoddard and the News representative, the details of which are not for publication, but which promise to create a sensation, not only in the moving picture, but in the legitimate theatre world when made known. Mr. Laemmle said Ohio looked good to him, and he will never miss another Ohio exhibitors' meeting if he could arrange to attend.

Mr. Tom Evans, general manager of the Powers Picture Play Company, of New York, also submitted to an interview, and said:

"There has been some wonderful improvements in the motion picture industry. Three years ago we used a machine running three hundred feet an hour. Now 18,000 feet of film are printed an hour. We are spending five times as much on good pictures to-day as two years ago. We are paying more money for motion pictures stories, $50 to $75 being paid for an original idea. Three years ago we never thought of taking the company away from New York. Now we have companies in Los Angeles, New Mexico, two in New York, and one about to go South. We engaged Mildred Holland at a price that two years ago would have caused any film concern to quit business. She will start another picture in the near future which she will individually direct. It will cost us a great sum of money."

Mr. Evans is accompanied by his accomplished wife, and they added much to the sociability of the gathering.

President M. A. Neff, of Cincinnati, in an interview, said:

"Ohio is to be congratulated for this representative gathering of picture men from all parts of the United States. No National officers are to be elected at this time."

At the meeting of the National Exhibitors' League committee, Monday evening, it was recommended that a national censor board be appointed by Congress or the President, or, that a law be passed in each state authorizing the Governor to appoint a censorship board. The national officers object to police departments being authorized as censors of artistic and moral pictures, and also believe that the exhibitors should be consulted.

Mr. Neff believes that the Western film drama is not overdone, but the exhibitors advocate that everything should be true to nature as to scenery, and urged that the artificial stage setting be eliminated. He said the Exhibitors' League, both national and state, are friendly to all manufacturers. He said the manufacturers had to worry about getting out pictures, but the exhibitors had to to worry about getting people in the picture theatres.

In the illustration accompanying this article the enterprise of the Moving Picture News is shown. The News correspondent is shown holding a copy of the News in his hand, while Mr. Carl Laemmle, Mrs. Herbert Miles, wife of the secretary of the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company, and others are holding copies, one of which shows Mr. P. A. Powers, proprietor of the Powers Picture Play Company, in full size. A number of these pictures were made by Pathe and Gaumont. Others in the picture are: President, J. A. Brulator, William Lord Wright (with a copy of the News in his hand), Charles Simone, Carl Laemmle, Harry Raver, Tom Evans, Mark Dintenfass, Adam Kessell, Bert Adler, Mrs. Kessell, Mrs. Miles and Mrs. Evans.

Ralph Radnor Earle, representative of the Pathe's Weekly, was on hand with his ever-ready machine, as was Mr. Riche, of the Gaumont Company. They secured the best views of Dayton and huge crowd that thronged her thoroughfares. The meeting will close Wednesday evening with a banquet in the National Cash Register Convention Hall.

I met "Smiling Bert" Adler, of the Thanhouser Company, for the first time. Adler has a reputation for making a hit with married women and he certainly sustained it at the convention. Whenever the Misses Miles, Evans, Kessel or Macahan were missing it was a cinch they were out walking or taxi-ing with Ad. He is so sedate and ladylike himself, he is always good company for the ladies—if they5re married and unromantic.

Adler is about fifteen years younger than most of us thought he would be. In fact, he was from fifteen to twenty years younger than any of the other Sales Company delegates—he's just old enough to vote. SOME age for a representative of so august a body as the Sales Company and so mighty a man as Edwin Thanhouser. Bert is an odd combination—with the morals of a minister and the good-fellowship of a "mixer." Bert bumped the Dayton Press for keeps with several unusual stories that kept the conventionites in a roar, the best of which, of course, was the "honeymoon" yarn, in which he was assisted by Mrs. Herbert Miles, and which made him the most sought after man in Dayton for two days. Hats off to the original "Thannhouser Kid."

Among the notables who circulated among the exhibitors were: D. W. McKinney, representing the Motion Picture Sales Company, New York; R. R. Nehls, American Film Mfg. Company, of Chicago; Sam Bullock, general manager of the Erie Amusement Company, Cleveland. R. P Stoddard, editor of the moving picture department of the Cleveland Leader; George Balsdon, Photoplay Advertising Company, Pittsburgh; Allen L. Haase, advertising manager, Electricity Magazine Corporation, Chicago, and last, but not least, M. A. Neff, whose presence was universally felt and whose offices as president of the American and Ohio Exhibitors' League is ably filled.

OF THE

Motion Picture Exhibitors League of Ohio

Held in Dayton, Ohio, March 26th, 1912

Morning Session of March 26, at auditorium theatre.
President Neff Presiding.

The President: The convention will please come to order. We have met here this morning for the purpose of getting acquainted, of explaining to you the program, to take in all the new members that wish to join.

First, I want to announce that there was a little mistake down at the depot. It seemed that we couldn't get together on how the train was to come in and how the picture was to be taken; so it seems there was a mistake or two made. We are going to take three other pictures, so that if anybody has been disappointed in any way, you will have the third opportunity or fourth, rather. We will meet before we start to the Cash Register Works in front of the courthouse. I am informed by the Committee of Dayton Local No. 5, you will all line up; the Cleveland Local, the Cincinnati Local, the Columbus Local, and so on, will get together and there will be a motion picture taken by both the Pathe and Gaumont in front of the courthouse, at 1:30. Meet at 1:15. We immediately go to the Cash Register Works, where we will hold a meeting. You will be addressed by the Mayor of Dayton and by Congressman Cox, provided he reaches here in time; and also by Mr. Deeds, manager of the Cash Register Works.

I want to say that the Cash Register Works have been very kind to the exhibitor, and fully appreciate the importance of our mission here, and they also fully understand that the pictures taken here to-day will be shown throughout the entire world. They are alive to the fact that the motion picture organization in the near future will be the strongest organization that is known throughout the country. (Applause.)

I cannot help but say one or two words in regard to our first meeting. Looking over this vast audience and looking you in the face and remembering what our Treasurer said to me one time in Columbus when it looked dark and gloomy for the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League—he said to me, "Mr. Neff, I have had in my mind that the time might come"—although he didn't expect it so soon—"that we, as motion picture exhibitors, can get together and work for the good and the common cause of all of us, and that we might sometime meet in a meeting where we would have a banquet." He said, "I have had this in my mind." He has already seen that come to pass at Cleveland. He is here to-day and can see the work that has been done and the progress made.

Now, gentlemen, we are making progress. This is an open meeting. I know there are reporters here and other people. We are not holding what you would call an executive session. This meeting was called together to tell you about the program and also to appoint a few committees. The Motion Picture Exhibtors' League isn't understood in a general way by the public. We have people whom, it seems, do not understand or do not care to understand our motives. We are organized for the purpose of uplifting the business and eliminating those things that have crept into the business in an earlier day. The people now engaged in the motion picture exhibitors' business are business men. It isn't like it was eight years ago. Thousands, millions of dollars have been invested in this business, and business men are in the business, and we are trying to uplift the business. We are trying to bring it prominently before the people that they can see what we now see. Of course, there are going to be many people in America who claim to be educators—many educators will claim that they know how this is done and that, and at the same time they haven't even dreamed of the possibilities of cinematography. It is way beyond them, and yet they will come to it after a while.

When you represent a business that is educating the world, when you represent a business that makes it possible for a man studying surgery to graduate in a year where heretofore it took him probably four or five years, you can readily understand what cinematography means. We are educating the people along sanitary conditions. We are bringing them historical pictures. We are not only educating them but we are amusing them. Cinematography cannot lie. It tells you the truth every time. If the picture is a fake-up, it tells you. If it is real, you know it. The practical eye, looking at pictures, will tell you quickly whether it is taken in a room like this or whether it is natural scenery.

I do not care to discuss this subject at length now, but I want to say this, that the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League is organized for good, and we want the support of every ladies' organization and every other organization throughout the country to co-operate with us in order that we may uplift the business and place it on so high a plane that they cannot throw and hit cinematography with any of their ridicule or abuse. We are in this business as business men, and as an evidence that we mean business all you have to do is to look around you to-day.

Now, we are going to meet out at the Cash Register Works. We will have addresses out there, by prominent men. Now, when we leave here and you pass the motion picture, please move as fast as you can, because a motion picture acts quickly, as you all know. When we get out there we have speaking. After that a visit through the Cash Register Works, and you are welcome by the Cash Register Works. Now, this evening I believe that they have arranged for Kinemacolor pictures and special features and vaudeville. To-morrow at ten o'clock the committees appointed here to-day will report at the Hall of the National Cash Register Works, where we go into executive session. To-morrow night a banquet will be given at the Cash Register banquet hall.

I am sorry to announce, but I might as well do it at the present time, that Senator Foraker, our national counsel, will probably not be here. I am sorry to announce it, but it cannot be helped. He has a very sore throat and he is afraid to come and make a speech, and his doctor has advised against it. And he is as disappointed as we are; I talked with him several times, and he is with us and is ready at any time to take up any point of law that we wish decided or looked into.

Hon. John J. Lentz will positively be here to-morrow, and the Rev. Bigelow will be here to-morrow, the night of our banquet, and Mr. Lentz will also be here at the same time.

Now, I want to say for Dayton, when I came here to Dayton they had two members of our League—Mr. Kerr and Mr. Weaver. I consulted with them about bringing the convention to Dayton and they showed such a splendid disposition to help us, and I said, "I will take the chance on two of you making this a success." They went to work, and the outgrowth of coming to Dayton is that we have a splendid local here—Local No. 5—which is doing everything and has done it right to entertain us, and they want you to understand that you are at home and among your friends, and I believe that nearly every exhibitor in Dayton belongs to the League. They have some thirty members here at the present time, and Dayton welcomes you and we are glad to be here in Dayton.

As near 12:30 as possible, all the visiting ladies will please report here at the Auditorium, where automobiles will be waiting to take you sightseeing through Dayton. And then you will get into the parade to go on out to the Cash Register Works.

A Member in Audience: The ladies will be entertained at the Wurlitzer's to-morrow at two o'clock, and after that we will take them to Rike's for tea—at Wurlitzer's at two and at Rike's about four.

The President: So the committee has done everything possible to try to entertain the ladies and make them feel at home; and the gentlemen can get along and amuse themselves while the ladies are having a splendid time. Now, Mr. Weaver, who is on the committee here on arrangements, announces that he wants the ladies to be prompt and be here as near 12:30 as possible, so that after they take you riding through the city you can get in the moving picture at the corner of Third and Main streets and in front of the Philips House. Now, you understand that; so kindly arrange your hats properly and be there.

Now, gentlemen, I am going to appoint two or three committees to report to-morrow. One of these committees will be—I will appoint it without asking for motions.—I will appoint a committee of three to recommend colors for this League,—for the State League of Ohio. I will appoint on that committee the gentleman from Bellaire as one—I don't see him, but he is here; and I will appoint the President of the Local at Columbus, and Dr. Prentiss, of Toledo. Now, gentlemen, we want a report on those colors to-morrow at ten o'clock. Now, every committee that is appointed, please report, get together; this is business and must be attended to, and report promptly, if you please, and be decisive about it; settle it.

I am going to appoint a committee on legislation, to recommend what we shall do. I shall appoint Mr. Weaver, of Dayton, one, and Mr. Morris, of Cleveland, and Mr. Ludiking, of Cincinnati.

Now, if there are any other committees that you wish appointed, please announce them. Now, in regard to your dues, those of you who have not paid your dues,—this is Mr. Max Stearn, the State Treasurer. Mr. Stearn will gladly give you a receipt for your dues. Now, all of you that have not registered, I want you to register before you leave here, if you can. It is important, for this reason: we are going to issue new cards to all of you that don't belong to locals, something like this (holding up a card), with a leather case, so that you will have it, and we will have to know your name and address so that these cards can be made out between now and to-morrow when you come to the convention. Don't fail to register. Who has the register book? Mr. Kerr—and there is Mr. Kerr over on that side. Get at a table, Mr. Kerr, and I would like to have all register whether you are members or not.

I am going to appoint a committee now to interview everybody that is here in the exhibitor business, asking them to join our League. I will appoint John J. Huss, of Cincinnati. Some of the officers I can't appoint because they will be too busy. And the gentleman right down there—I forget his name; I will appoint him on that committee. And as there are lady exhibitors here, I am going to appoint Mrs. Snepp on that committee, to see if she can't get some ladies to join our organization. (Applause and laughter.) And I am going to appoint Mr. Kenny, of Cleveland, on that committee. I am also going to appoint Mr. Kauffman, of Gallipolis, on that committee. I will also appoint Mr. Buck, of Cincinnati, on that committee. I am making it a big committee because I want you to work with these people that come here and get them to join our organization. We want to show you what we are doing. And we will show you that you want to get in this organization. You can't afford to stay out. You are either with us or against us; because every minute that you remain outside of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League organization, you are loaning strength, aid and assistance to those who seek to profit by us not getting together. Now remember that every day that an exhibitor stays outside of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League he assists—if we have any enemies—our enemies; and every one of you that come in add that much strength to the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League. (Applause.)

I want to say to you that last night we were up very late—the National Organization. However, our work has been effective—we took in the great State of Missouri, which applied for admission. We didn't only get Missouri but we took in the seat of intelligence—supposed to be until we get out here among the people of Ohio and along farther West—we took in the District of Columbia—Washington, D. C. Now, we have representation that we didn't have before in Washington, D. C., and we have a new State added to our national organization, which makes eleven States. That isn't doing so bad, my friends, to start last August—adding eleven of the biggest States in the Union to the convention, and we hope to add eleven more before we meet in Chicago in August.

If there is anything now that you wish to have reported, this is the time and place. If there is anybody that doesn't thoroughly understand the program, please ask the question.

There was no way to avoid the taking of the picture this morning. The picture is good, but it wasn't done just the way we wanted it. The railroad men didn't know where they were coming in and the camera men had to change and I had to change with them.

Now, is there any other committee that you wish to have appointed here? Now, the committee to secure new members will please get down near the outer door, and when a man registers—and we want every one of you exhibitors, whether you are members or not, to register—and whenever he registers talk to him and see if he can't be convinced of the fact that he should join our league.

Now, I would call on several gentlemen here who could make splendid speeches, but it is getting late, and I know that the ladies will be anxious for the automobile ride, and all of you will be anxious to see Dayton for a few minutes. However, I am going to introduce to you the President of the State of Pennsylvania, who is one of the boys in the trenches, you might say. He is a worker, and he is vice-president from Pennsylvania. I will just introduce him, and he will speak to you later—Mr. Harrington, of Pennsylvania. I want to introduce also Mr. Kreff, of Pittsburgh, Pa. Mr. Sweeney, of Chicago, Ill. who gave away three thousand dollars to charity in one day. Mr. Sweeney handled that money as he was treasurer of that local. The gentleman on my right will not need an introduction—Mr. Morris, the President of the Local at Cleveland.

Ladies and gentlemen, there is a very pleasant young gentleman back here who states that he desires to take a group picture in front, if you will please stop out there again, and he won't charge you anything for it, and he will take a good picture if you will just step in front there. He wants it for the Herald newspaper, and it has a large circulation, and you know the rest. Now, is there anything further to come before the meeting?

A Member: I would like to have a little lunch.

The President: It is in order to make a motion to adjourn, if you are hungry. I understand that those that don't go out in automobiles will find cars standing down there for transportation—that is, for the overflow—if there are more people than we have automobiles. Remember when we get to the Cash Register Works we are going to take another moving picture of you right in front of the big building.

Thereupon the meeting adjourned, to meet at 1:30 p. m., at the National Cash Register Co.

AFTERNOON SESSION, MARCH 26, 1912,
At the Convention Hall of The National Cash Register Company.
President Neff Presiding.

The President: I will ask the State officers to please come up on the platform—the State treasurer, vice-presidents and secretary. I will ask that all of the vice-presidents from the twelve States present please come on to the platform—the vice-presidents will please come on the platform—of the various States. Mr. Morris, Mr. Owen Parker, of Kentucky; Mr. Harrington, of Pennsylvania—all of the vice-presidents of the various States will please come to the platform—Michigan, Indiana, Mr. Dickson—is he present? The meeting will please come to order. Before we proceed I desire to read a telegram from Senator J. B. Foraker and one from Congressman James M. Cox, of your city. (Reads.) "M. A. Neff, President Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, Dayton, Ohio:- I regret more than I shall undertake to express my inability to be in Dayton to-day. I have been unavoidably detained here. I sincerely wish you a successful and an enjoyable convention. Senator J. B. Foraker, of Cincinnati." (Reading.) "M. A. Neff, President Motion Picture Exhibitors: I find at the last moment that it is impossible for me to be there. The Child Labor Bureau bill, one of the most important pieces of legislation in recent years, is apt to come out of the committee on the floor of the House at any time, and it would be plain neglect of my duty if I were to leave here. It is a great disappointment not to be in Dayton and add my part in extending the welcome of our city. The importance of the motion pictures has just become to be realized. I have observed their enterprise here within the last few months, and the part you are playing in giving to that community governmental and patriotic scenes that it is bound to be recognized by the public generally, because it cannot but inspire a great love of country and in our institutions. It is wholesome and you are entitled to every encouragement and co-operation. The tendency towards those human activities which create better standards of life is universally commended. James M. Cox."

Ladies and gentlemen, I now have the pleasure of introducing to you the Mayor of Dayton, Mr. Phillips.

Mayor Edward Phillips: Mr. Chairman and Delegates to the Convention, I am most assuredly gratified to be called upon and privileged to extend to you the welcome of our city. Your association is recognized to-day as one of the leading educational institutions of our country, and the interest manifested by all classes of our people demonstrates the fact that your efforts for their entertainment are being appreciated by them.

Not very many of us have had opportunity for travel, not only in our own country, but abroad. One can go to almost any of the motion picture theatres to-day and see possibly ancient Egyptian scenes—scenes in the jungles of Africa, actual occurrences in the land of the midnight sun, or, coming to our own United States—life in New York, Chicago, or any of the larger cities—the beauties of Yellow Stone Park and life on the Mississippi. Aside from scenes of travel or those connected with historical events, one may see comedy, tragedy or some pleasing episode of daily happenings almost anywhere. The people are also interested from a standpoint of recreation and the relief from toils and struggles of every-day life.

Again I desire to say that you have come to stay.

Therefore, on behalf of the citizens of Dayton and in my position as Chief Executive, I bid you a sincere and hearty welcome. May your deliberations and council be harmonious and profitable, and when you return to your own homes and firesides I trust that you will look back with much pleasure to your visit to Dayton, the best city in the best State in the best country on the globe. (Applause.)

The President: (At this point Mr. Neff made an address replying to the Mayor's address of welcome, which address of Mr. Neff's is not here inserted as it was previously written.) I shall now take pleasure in introducing a gentleman who has extended courtesies to this organization and has done everything in his power to make you welcome here in Dayton, and especially at the National Cash Register Company Works. I have the pleasure, ladies and gentlemen, of introducing to you the General Manager of the Cash Register Works, Mr. Deeds.

Mr. E. A. Deeds, Vice-president and General Manager of the National Cash Register Company. (Great applause.)

I appreciate very much the hearty response you have given after an introduction of this sort; I appreciate it and will take it for those men that have helped entertain you people and will do so in the next day. We are interested in your work. We are interested for two reasons: one is because you are an organization. There has been one thing that we have tried to advocate—if there is one thing more than anything else, it has been organization. We have spent more time, probably, in our business along that one line than any other one line—that of bringing our organization closer together and bringing it up to the highest state of perfection that we possibly can, and what little success we as a company have attained has been on account of our organization. And I want to congratulate you people—you members of this convention—on having gotten together in an organization. I want to congratulate your president, Mr. Neff, on having been able to get together such a body as this. I believe that I am in position to appreciate more than some of you gentlemen here the amount of work that it has taken on his part to bring about this assemblage and bring about an organization of people whose interests at first seemed diversified, but after all who are all interested in one common thing. And I want to congratulate him on his work and you on the work that you are doing in trying to get together and help push ahead your business, and that is what you are here for—to talk things over.

We are glad to have you here and extend to you a most cordial welcome, so that you can come here with your deliberations. This is a new hall. It has only been used for the convention of our own people so far, and your convention is the first convention, except the Cash Register convention, that has ever met in this hall, and I feel as though it couldn't be better dedicated to-day than to the Motion Picture people. (Great applause.)

The second reason why we are interested in this thing—first, because you are organized and get together, and we are in sympathy with any movement along that line; and in the second place, we have always believed in the education by pictures. Years ago, before the motion picture was developed, we had, in order to better instruct our people, to get the old-fashioned stereopticon lantern slide, and in our school work, teaching our own people here, we found it a most invaluable thing; in other words, we couldn't run our business to-day if it wasn't for the stereopticon and the lantern slides. It has become a vital part of our organization. The motion picture goes still farther along this same line, and this hall was designed primarily as a place where we can properly exhibit our motion pictures and other pictures before our conventions and the different schools and agents and factory people, so that we could build up our organization.

We are interested in the picture business. We want to see what the latest things are so that we can have them and keep our people up to date. It is an educational process, and you people have the grandest opportunity in the world along that line. It won't be five years—it is to-day, but people don't realize it, but it won't be five years until the whole public is going to realize that the motion picture exhibitors are the most powerful educational factor we have in this country. (Applause.)

You have the opportunity of getting hold of the people and bringing them together here, concentrating the advanced ideas from all over the world. There isn't anything so broadening as travel, and to the people who cannot travel you are able to bring the thing and lay it down in front of them, just as it actually is, and we want to congratulate you upon your work. At first you had to start out to entertain the people. And we are glad to see that educational films are being run, and in most of our motion picture shows here in our own city every week and more frequently at times there are certain educational films run along that channel, and you have the grand opportunity, and I know you are going to do it.

We appreciate pictures. We couldn't do without them. We can't do without the motion pictures. It is a part of our organization and our educational work here, and you people have the grand opportunity, and we want to congratulate you on being together here as an assemblage to try and work out a better way of pushing your grand good work ahead. We wish you Godspeed in it. We wish you the most successful convention you can possibly have, and I want to extend to you the hospitality of this factory. It is yours for a day or two. You can have any piece of it or run it any old way you please. (Laughter and applause.) We turn it over to you and you can make any suggestions you want to, and if there is anything over there that you think will help you in your business just take it home with you. (Applause.)

The President: Ladies and gentlemen, we are now going to run one picture—Kinemacolor. After that, you will be shown through the National Cash Register Works, which I assure you, if you go through, you will never forget it. Then we meet here this evening, and we have vaudeville and other pictures. I want to announce that every vice-president of the National Exhibitors' League is expected to be at the Algonquin Hotel to-night at 7 p. m.

(At this point a number of views of Dayton factories and the N. C. R. Co. were shown.)

The President: To-morrow at ten o'clock we want every exhibitor in Dayton to be at this hall and meet with us—remember, ten o'clock to-morrow. It makes no difference whether you are a member of our League or not. We want every exhibitor to come here. You are welcome; it will be an open session for a little while to-morrow, so that we can talk matters over. Now, the Cash Register people will take you over and show you the factory—every department; don't hurry, you will have plenty of time. Just a minute. Here is a gentleman who has come all the way from New York to say a few words to you—Mr. Hope Jones.

Mr. Hope Jones: Mr. President, ladies and gentlemen, I have a few words to say to you on the subject of music. We have been hearing how the motion pictures are to be uplifted. We all welcome that. We all believe it. But there is one other thing that ought to be elevated, and I just think it may profit you if I say half a dozen words upon the subject, and that is the music connected with the moving pictures.

Now, there is no use of us trying to get finer pictures unless we have finer houses, and that is coming, and also we ought to get finer music and it will pay you to do it. The Rudolph Wurlitzer Company has taken this matter up especially, and they have employed me—they bought me, body and soul, pretty well. I am an organ builder, but farther than that, I am an enthusiast. I don't care a hang about the money end of it, but as an artist in the organ building I thoroughly enjoy myself. For forty years I have been building organs for the great cathedrals of England, and now I am in this country, and I have turned my attention to the improvement of the organ for secular purposes. The business is immense. To-day one theatre manager has ordered ten great big instruments, fifteen thousand dollars apiece, for his theatres, and so it goes. And they are being taken up all over the country. And this is what I want to speak to you about. I put in Philadelphia for this Rudolph Wurlitzer Company a large instrument, but it had on it these additions—the orchestral additions, and that was placed in the Baptist Temple at Broad street, Philadelphia, and that attracted in sixteen evening performances by playing music for the people—we got for a charge of half a dollar, and some seats a quarter—we crammed that great church, which holds three thousand five hundred people;—we crammed North Broad street and Berk street, and we actually had to telephone for the police reserves to dismiss the people. Now, we have nothing else but this instrument and one player to pay, and the instrument which cost around fifteen—seventeen thousand dollars was paid for in a very short time, and those people have been listening to that instrument now for over a hundred performances and still crowds come.

There is a great future, I believe, in combining those two things—an instrument that will attract the people, that will hold them, that will be heard blocks away, that will give them all the orchestra additions in addition to the fine organ tone, and those things, I think, will be a great assistance when those two are combined. I mustn't detain you longer, but I look forward to the pleasure of hearing the finest music—the music going up as well as the pictures, because they ought to rise together.

(The president again announced the vaudeville entertainment for the evening, stating that Miss Margaret Russell would be there. The meeting then adjourned until 10:00 a. m. March 27, 1912.)

SIDE LIGHTS ON THE CINEMATOGRAPH

By Leonard Donaldson

In my last article I gave an abridged account of the attack made upon the cinematograph by an English weekly journal, John Bull. The exact nature of the charges made are not only too futile to occupy valuable space, but are such that are only fit for repetition in the type of journal from whence they originated. The English trade journals have made but passing reference to them. The editor of The Kinematograph Weekly says: "I hardly feel called upon to refer to the matter . . . save for the fact that the invidious heading, 'Shocking Cinematograph Shows,' may have led some members of the public to believe that the exhibitions complained of were to be seen at the recognized electric theatres in the metropolis, and I should like to disabuse their minds on that point. . . . Such headlines must cast utterly undeserved odium upon those carrying on a legitimate business in a thoroughly respectable and praiseworthy manner."

With this statement I am entirely in accord. The public are all too ready to subscribe to this particular type of scurrilous journalism which, it is to be regretted, is growing in England. Sensational headlines, such as those in question, prove quite sufficient to extract the pence from the masses in search of "spicy" reading. The articles generally continue until the "creators" of them are challenged—then they promptly cease. Proof of this assertion will be found in the following correspondence which passed between myself and my partner and the editor of John Bull, and which was published in the Bioscope on February 1 last:

Editor, John Bull.

Dear Sir—Referring to your issues of the 13th, 20th and 27th inst., we beg to state that, in the interests of the cinematograph industry, we are willing to offer you our services, and the advantages of our intimate knowledge of the business, in connection with that of your "Special Commissioner," to endeavor to bring to justice the originators of this infamous business of secret cinematograph exhibitions. We, therefore, are willing to conduct investigations over a period of one week, commencing on Monday next, January 29, and during that time we shall visit all the most likely rendezvous of the nefarious individuals mentioned in your articles.

In the event of either one of us being accosted by any of these "touts," and conducted to the place where the films are at that time being shown, we are willing to hand over the sum of £2 /2 (two guineas), which shall be placed to the credit of the Human Document Fund.

We shall be obliged to receive your written acceptance of this challenge by return, and beg to remain,

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) Leonard Donaldson,
J. P. Mullins.

I received the following reply two days afterward from the editor:

John Bull Editorial Offices,
93, Long Acre, London W. C.,

Dear Sirs—I am obliged by your letter, but as the objectionable shows have now been closed we are doing nothing further in regard to the matter at present.

Yours faithfully,

The Editor.

We are to believe that the exhibitions have now ceased to exist—at any rate the articles have; on this point, I am sure. "Mare's Nest" expeditions are unprofitable things, and the editor of the journal in question has my thanks for thus preventing a serious waste of time.

VERB. SAP.

G. D. MACINTYRE IS INTERVIEWED

That Mr. G. D. Macintyre, of the Motion Picture Distributing & Sales Company, was interviewed by one of our staff quite recently is practically all that we have to say with regard to that particular interview. The sum and substance of Mr. Macintyre's remarks with regard to himself was this: "I am a Highland Scotchman, therefore I have nothing to say about myself."

However, in spite of Mr. Macintyre's qualms of modesty, we venture to proclaim at this writing that since his advent some few months ago as manager of the Motion Picture Distributing & Sales Company, he has given to the members of that company the most entire satisfaction.

Mr. Macintyre is a man of large theatrical experience, conscientious almost to a fault, honorable and reasonable (the latter quality is important) in all his dealings with the trade.

To be brief and to the point, G. D. Macintyre promises to be one of the leading lights in the business department of motion picturedom.

It is possible that motion pictures will eventually become as much a part of the school week as Friday afternoon speaking or debating was years ago. Educators in a dozen cities, including Philadelphia, St. Paul, Detroit, Newark, Minneapolis, Denver and San Francisco, are already in favor of their use for giving instructions in history and geography, and Dr. Maxwell, superintendent of the city schools in New York, has finally given his support to the idea. The National Education Association, comprising representatives from virtually every state in the Union, is also considering the question, and may exert its influence toward introducing the films as a regular part of the usual system of instruction. Whether it will last any longer than the old stereopticon or "magic lantern" did for school lectures, remains to be seen.—Lawrence (Mass.) American.

SCIENCE AND ART AFFILIATED

By Robert Grau

"I am playing for posterity, and I am grateful that I live in an age wherein such art as yet remains with me may be preserved through science and artifice."

Thus spoke the divine Sarah—the incomparable Bernhardt—who recently when remonstrated with, because she had capitulated to the inducements offered by a moving picture concern, expressed herself further as follows:

"Art is art. Whether it be presented at the Comedie Francaise or at the music halls—an artist can make the excursion from one to the other with grace and dignity."

That Mme. Bernhardt was actuated through public spirit in permitting herself to pose before the camera is not so certain, for the report is that she was paid fifty thousand dollars for the "canning" of the great play of "Camille." Nevertheless, it is not to be denied that this Ajax of two centuries, who at the age of sixty-seven is able to appear in the most fatiguing roles from eight to ten times a week, has established a precedent that may well be emulated by her colleagues in this country.

Sarah is not the first great celebrity to pose for motion pictures. Jane Hading, the great Rejane, Mounet-Sully and all of the Coquelins have been paid enormous sums by the French film producers, and in thus allowing their artistry to be perpetuated on the screen they are merely following in the lead of the grand opera singers, some of whom are assured tremendous incomes for many years as a result of the royalties from their phonograph records.

The illustrious Caruso was greatly consoled during the last two years by the knowledge that his losses by reason of his incapacity for grand opera have been more than made up by the receipt of over $150,000 in the same period from the Victor Phonograph Company, and there are those who think that the great tenor's vocal incapacity is partly due to the overtaxing of his voice in the effort to preserve for future generations the records of his marvelous voice.

However this may be, the fact remains that the world's greatest players and singers are bowing with equanimity to the encroachment on their realm of science and artifice, and after all who shall say them nay? What would we all give if the voices of Jenny Lind, Malibrau, Grisi, Mano and Tamberlik were preserved in the same manner and what a blessing it would be for the younger generation if the Adelina Patti of her prime, the one real diva who for thirty-five years was queen of song, and whose successor has not appeared on the horizon to this day—what would we all, young and old for that matter, give to get the vocal records of her exquisite rendition of those simple ballads, "The Last Rose of Summer" and "Home, Sweet Home?" And yet, sad to relate, the same Patti, who a generation ago would dismiss a ten thousand dollar audience because she was slightly hoarse, and who up to the year 1904 refused offers of one hundred thousand dollars from a phonograph company, yet in this very year with her voice but a shadow of its former greatness allowed herself to be "taken" by the Victor Company in those two plaintive ballads with which she was wont to enthrall her hearers so that they would forget where they were.

Alas, it was the same Patti; perhaps it was hoped that the phonograph might be merciful to the diva and that the trills and roulades would come true. Patti always, even at the age of sixty-six, deftly concealed her shortcomings, and her superb coloratura still was faultless as far as her deteriorated voice would permit, but alas! the phonograph is as merciless as it also is true.

The Patti who drew tears from audiences all over the world yet draws the tears from those who heard her in her prime, but the tears brought forth as a result of her vocal records are from a wholly different impulse.

LOOK AT THIS! SOMETHING NEW IN THE FILM BUSINESS!

The establishment of a legitimate film brokerage for remote domestic and foreign buyers has been a long-felt want in the industry. The buyer in Brazil, New Zealand and other portions of the earth remote from the New York market has worked up to the present time under a serious handicap.

In doing business with a foreign market there is at all times the danger of getting in the hands of the sharper, the man who pockets two-thirds of the money you send him to do busines for you on, and who sends you the value of the remainder in film chosen after the pattern of his own perverted tastes.

To be sure there are numberless others who carry on their business in an honest, conscientious way, but the buyer who is not on the ground is forced to take his chances among more than the "27 Varieties." We are, therefore, glad to be able to introduce to our readers a newly born, and thoroughly reliable film brokerage—reliable because the business of the firm is to be manipulated by conscientious business men who are not alone discriminating and capable with regard to their choice of films but who have the business of the buyer at heart, realizing that in order to facilitate their own business interests, the best interests of their clients must be well looked after.

The firm which we recommend so highly to our readers is that of MacIntyre and Kerr, whose business offices are to be found in the German Bank building, 147 Fourth avenue, New York City.

In doing business with this firm, who, by the way, are not in any way in league with the manufacturer, choosing subjects deemed by them suitable to the buyer from among advance releases of individual manufacturers, and who derive their only revenue from the percentage charged the buyer for time and service rendered in the work.

An important point in the dealings of this firm is the fact that they handle none of the money remitted by the buyer except what their rate of percentage may call for. The money of the buyer is transmitted through his own personal broker to a New York bank from whence the money is paid as bills fall due for goods actually purchased and handled by their transport shippers at New York. Absolutely no films are handled at the office of the New York brokerage, of which Mr. James L. MacIntyre, formerly general manager of the Nestor Film Company, and of eight years' moving picture experience, and J. Willard Kerr, an excellent and experienced business man, have charge.

Both the foreign and domestic trade are greatly in need of a brokerage of this sort, and it looks to us like another move toward the uplift, advancement and perpetuation of the film industry.

CAPTAIN SCOTT FILMS

(Handled by Sedeg Film Company by Authorization of Gaumont)

These splendid films of the entrance of the land of mystery approximate to the South Pole, which, by authorization of the Gaumont Company are to be handled by, and State rights sold through the Sedeg Film Company, are among the most wonderful films ever put on the market.

To be able to see living, moving productions of those frozen regions, pale and uncanny beneath the half light of the midnight sun, is something more—infinitely more—than most of us could ever have even dreamed of seeing.

It is impossible to even imagine, without actually viewing it with our own eyes, the solemn grandeur, the big loneliness of those tremendous frozen barriers, those vast fields of ice that challenge the daring explorer who ventures thither.

These films obtained by the Gaumont Company are truly illustrative of the trip of Captain Scott from his starting point at New Zealand to Cape Evans.

Interesting scenes from the Captain Scott films are the flocks of penguins on the ice, the landing of the Siberian ponies, whose delight upon being placed upon terra firma is pathetic, the bucking of the great ice floes by the "Terra Nova," the landing of supplies, the dog teams, the midnight sun, and many other phenomena peculiar to that portion of the globe.

The Gaumont Company, as announced in last issue, have joined the Sales Company and is now an important addition to that organization, reinforcing with its beautiful hand-colored films the already splendid curriculum of that concern.

The release days of the Gaumont with the Sales Company will be the same as before its entry into that body: Tuesday comedy day, and Saturday drama day.

WESTERN CORRESPONDENT

Hot Springs, Ark., March 27.—Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to state in this week's letter that the battle of ballots being waged this glorious Wednesday of March 27th, has resulted in the defeat of J. B. Wood, reform prosecuting attorney, who is a candidate for renomination, but, considering the fact that I am not a clairvoyant, I am unable to forecast what the outcome will be, but will give the result in my next week's letter. The defeat of Judge Wood will mean that the picture shows here will be open on Sunday and that the big league teams will be permitted to play baseball on Sunday, and that there will be harmless entertainment on Sunday for the thousands of visitors who come to the Arkansas Spa during the winter season.

It has been the hottest and most vindictive campaign that has ever been held in Garland County. The city, in all its political history of hotly contested elections, has never witnessed anything like it, and it would do those who love to smell the smoke of a bitter political fight good to see the red hot accusations that are being printed against candidates in the local papers. Gee, it's fierce! Monday night the town simply went "dippy!" The five men in the race met in the Grand Opera House and presented their claims to one of the largest audiences that ever gathered to hear a political debate, and what they said about one another is a shame to relate. According to their mutual estimate of each other, a horse-thief is a companion to be desired.

This is the first time the Grand Opera House, by the way, has been open since Dick Baird undertook to run the first Sunday picture show in open violation of Judge Wood's orders. There was a swarm of officers pouncing on poor Richard that night, and he was pinched as often as his operator turned the crank.

If the result of to-day's election is that Judge Wood gets the office, we are destined to see a lively contest between him and the liberal sheriff, but the business men generally desire the town open just a little bit, and, though I have the highest respect for law and order, here's hoping the liberal candidate "comes home with the bacon."

There was one attraction at the Auditorium Theatre that drew the greatest crowd in the history of the house. The magnet in question was none other than Andrew Carnegie; he lectured there, explaining every detail of the National Reserve Association. The day was about as inclement as one would care to see. The rain fell in torrents, and there was a gale blowing, yet the theatre, which is one of the largest in the South, seating about 1,700 persons, was jammed from pit to dome, and hundreds crowded the aisles and stood up in the rear on all three floors. The venerable Ironmaster received an ovation that eclipsed any tribute ever given any visitor to Hot Springs, and when I talked with him in his rooms in the Arlington Hotel, after the lecture, his kindly face beamed with appreciation. He is mighty glad that he came to Hot Springs, and the city has won another booster.

And now for a little moving picture "dope"! A rather amusing and unusual incident happened at the New Central Theatre the past week. This house was featuring the Selig reel, "The Diamond S. Ranch" (and let me say it was a "pippin"), and when the boys were putting the lithographs out in front of the theatre there stepped up a tall gentleman, fashionably attired, who bore a strong resemblance to the picture of one of the cowpunchers in the one-sheet litho. Maurice Peal, who is one of the New Central Theatre boys, remarked to him on the subject, and was surprised to hear the man say:

"Well, why shouldn't it—I'm the fellow in the picture."

And, lo and behold, he was, too! He was none other than Nip Van, one of the cowboys, and he was here for a vacation and a course of baths. Nip didn't look much like a cowboy, but in order that there might be no question as to his identity, he produced photographs showing the identical scenes in the picture, and there he was, mounted on his pony, with all the embellishments of office. It might be stated in passing that Nip is having the time of his life. If there is anything that he is not seeing, it is because it hasn't been discovered. His "war bags" are well supplied with those long green slips that Uncle Sam designates as "ready money," and he is a liberal spender. "Billy" Maurice, former Thespian, and hero of many a burnt cork half-circle, but who at present is head of the new Maurice bathhouse, the most palatial and complete in the city, has Nip in charge during his visit here, and he could not be in safer or more congenial hands.

I note that there was one moving picture company that put one over in great shape last week in Hillsville, Va., where the greatest crime against justice was ever committed. A few hours after the band of mountaineers had wiped out the entire circuit court there, a moving picture company arrived, and proceeded to utilize the same scene for enacting the tragedy over before the camera. Their efforts, however, according to an Associated Press report received in this city, quite startled the natives, and no wonder. Personally, I think they took an awful chance, and got a great picture. The name of the company wasn't mentioned by the "A. P.," but we are awaiting this reel with a great deal of interest, just the same.

THE MAN IN THE BATHS.

J. P. CHALMERS, OF NEW YORK, RECEIVES FRACTURED SKULL IN ELEVATOR SHAFT

Tragedy stalked in on the state convention of Moving Picture Exhibitors Tuesday afternoon about 3 o'clock when James P. Chalmers, of 125 East Twenty-third street, New York, editor of the Moving Picture World, a leading publication of the industry, was fatally injured, when, it is said, he fell down an elevator shaft in the N. C. R. convention hall, and, according to statements of several who were near, crashed to the cement floor. The convention meeting was in progress and no one knew who the injured man was.

A former moving picture man, now employed by the N. C. R. Company, found the body, horribly crushed. The company's physician was hastily summoned and, after an examination, ordered the injured man sent to Miami Valley Hospital in an N. C. R. Company automobile. At the hospital a check was found in his clothing for $700, made payable to J. B. Chalmers, by which he was identified. Two hundred and sixty dollars in bills were found.

Frank Winch, D. W. McKinney, Bert Adler and Harry Raver heard of the accident and hurried to the hospital in a taxi. Mr. Winch saw the injured man and declared that he was unrecognizable. His head was terribly crushed and he was suffering horrible agony.

A telegram was sent immediately to the parents of Mr. Chalmers, who reside in Connecticut. During the week the editor remained in New York, but always spent the week-end with his father, mother, and a sister and brother, whose names could not be ascertained.

When the news became known around the convention, the vaudeville and moving picture performance scheduled for Tuesday evening at the N. C. R. hall was called off by the film manufacturers, but was attended by the exhibitors, as arrangements had been completed. A heavy gloom was cast over the large gathering in the Algonquin last night as they discussed the only feature to mar the convention.

Mr. Chalmers was not registered at any of the hotels and the leaders of the convention had not located his baggage. It is thought that he arrived in the city shortly before 1:30, when he was seen at the Algonquin, and then hurried out to the N. C. R. hall, neglecting to register.

The story of the manner in which Mr. Chalmers was injured, as told by some, conflicts with the statement of officials of the N. C. R. Company, who allege that he had climbed a ladder preparatory to photographing the hall and, losing his balance, fell down the shaft.

A glass door opens into the freight elevator shaft, into which the unfortunate victim fell, and it is thought by many that he mistook the door for the one opening into the convention hall. The latter theory is upheld by all of those attending the convention who were questioned in regard to the accident.—Dayton Journal.

FILMORE'S INSIDE FILM TALK

ON THE MORAL HEALTH OF THE FILM STUDIOS

THE "FAST DIRECTOR" YARN

OCCASIONALLY you and I hear salacious stories about the film studios. Immoral practices are alleged on the part of the directors, and folks on the outside find great fun in believing all the scandal they hear. "Insiders," though, blink their eyes and pass the gossip by. They know that as a matter of fact the average film studio is as clean as a Sunday school—'cept for the swearin'. But then studio work is wearing on the nerves and there are some things worse about a nervous man than cussin'. Bank presidents, under severe mental strain, relieve themselves in expletives, so why not mere studio workers?

THE ACTRESS AND THE STUDIO

I AM not trying to give the film studios a clean bill of health because I am writing for a paper that boosts the business. I am simply saying what every "insider" knows to be the fact: That the average picture studio enjoys good moral health. Note that I say "the average studio." I admit exceptions. There are exactly three of 'em—three studios where I'd rather not see my sister work. And there are many, many studios in this country. A respectable girl can work in them and remain respectable. Of course, the foolish girl can do foolish things in any studio—but she can, too, at Sunday school. And the girl of character can get along in the characterless places at that, only the influences aren't "right" and she maintains her self-respect better by keeping from 'em. The "good" girl in the show business is a pretty self-reliant person and I would trust her in H—— itself, but just the same she is more attractive to her friends and to herself away from influences that contaminate and cheapen.

THE PICTURE PLAYER AND TEMPTATION

NO, THIS is no "rave" over the female studio worker. I am not the one to rave about 'em. Anyone who read a recent story by me in these columns, on the "artistic temperament" of the "silent stars," knows how said stars appeal to me. I'm not silent-star struck. I have even set her down as a temperamental fake and fraud in this very department, so it is no enthusiastic "fan" who is talking. But leaving temperament—artistic and unartistic—aside, I must hand it to the picture actress on the morality score. Generally, she is what worldly persons call "good." And as aforesaid the "good" professional girl is some "good." Make no mistake on that. Temptations that would bother the lady outside the business make no impression on her. She is temptation-wise and temptation-proof and the bothersome things are "all" in the day's work. They are forgotten about as quick as they happen.

SHOWMAN AND BUSINESS MAN

THE good, square, capable girl runs her reputation into no risks at the average picture plant. She minds her business and she gets along just as though she were home helping mother with the housework. Whatever bad things they say about her originate solely in the minds of persons who are not posted. The common error is made of figuring the picture business "loose" because it is an end of the show business—and show business has been considered "loose" since its beginning. Maybe it is—in sections. I'm not on the inside there. Maybe I am in the picture proposition. All I will say is that so few showmen are really good business men. Most film producers are. Immorality isn't considered good business by good business men. Rarely will they tolerate it—in themselves or their employees.

WHERE THE "FAST DIRECTOR" REALLY STANDS

THERE'S the crux of the situation: The employee. No matter how big a man is the picture stage director, he still is an employee—a mere hired man. He is strictly accountable to some boss—some business man for his methods and practices. Right here the stories of the "fast directors" go overboard! If the director was guilty of the items charged in the salacious tales, he simply wouldn't last. He'd be plain "canned." And the morality of the proposition wouldn't have so much to do with it at that—Mr. Business Man who owns the concern isn't going to see ruinous methods in connection with his business! He won't have his high-priced employees made the tools of scheming women. The theatrical manager might tolerate this, but the film producer is the man who is really making the money—and there's a reason. Can you guess it?

WHERE INVESTIGATION IS NEEDED

THE stories about the "fast" picture directors have emanated from people outside the business, as I said before. I heard a lot of this stuff from vaudeville people. It seemed to do them good to be able to "pan the pictures" and anything connected with the pictures. This is natural in competitors. I do not seek to turn the light of criticism away from the studios, since all criticism and all light is good; they reform and it is reformation makes the world go 'round. I invite the closest investigation of the picture studios to substantiate all the good things I have said about them. But it is the people who don't want investigation, who have a reason to fear it, that really need it most. You are wasting time to bother about the character of the film studios. Go to the variety business, Mr. Stage Reformer, and you will find your work cut out for you. In that end the stage does need elevation. Only yesterday a female friend of mine trying to book an act was submitted to insults from the responsible representative of one of the metropolitan vaudeville circuits. She was a good woman, a married woman, and even her wedding ring was no protection against him. About two or three weeks ago another good woman whom I know met with insult from this wretch. How many have met with insults whom I do not know, I'd hate to compute. The man is merely an employee, but then he is the employee of a showman and not of a business man. This showman, let me add, is a person of character, the head of a family, a big contributor to his church and to worthy aims generally.

WHAT THE FILM BUSINESS IS A MODEL FOR

BUT he is a showman, and in common with his kind does not bother with the personal morality of his employees. He takes his lieutenants' badness for granted just as do the other theatrical managers. He cannot see it is a bad business proposition to have a man with entanglements in his employ, unlike the business-man-film-producer. The showman pays for service, and gets—scandal. But somehow he goes about with his ears stuffed and stands for the unbusinesslike things. And maybe he wonders why the film producers are getting the money in the amusement business to-day. Some day an outraged father, brother or husband will go into the vaudeville booking districts with a gun and the carnage will be fearful. Maybe the noise will penetrate the cotton in the showman's ears. If it will, it will serve its purpose, for there will be a reorganization of the vaudeville business—it will simply be raised to the level of decency of the film business.

FILMORE.

WHAT ARE YOU TEACHING?

Perhaps few have ever given this phase of motion picture exhibiting a thought beyond the general question of morality or immorality. Few, if any, exhibitors offend in this direction now. They have learned that their best patronage is derived from those to whom an immoral film would be a horror. They endeavor to exhibit such films as will attract these peple again and again. In most instances they are rewarded by steadily increasing patronage and by the return of old patrons many times with numerous friends.

Occasionally an excellent historical film is exhibited. People go to see it because the advertising declares that it is something out of the ordinary, or else it illustrates a historical episode with which all are more or less familiar through reading or otherwise. In the main strict historic fact has been adhered to, though sometimes there is deviation for the purpose of maintaining the interest of the narrative, or of giving it a sensational flavor which it is believed will help in holding the attention. Usually such episodes are understood and create no false impressions.

There is a film going about which bears all the indications of careful work in the preparation of the scenario and the production. Yet it must be confessed that it is, in a way, misleading. It tells of the attempted betrayal of a well-known character in the history of America. He is saved by the detective work and warning of a little colored lad whom he presented with a coin upon his first visit to his master's mansion.

When the writer saw this film it seemed as though there was no criticism possible. Yet two women who sat immediately in front of him remarked when it was over that they did not remember reading about such an event in the life of the personage shown. The question now arises as to how far it is permissible to introduce semi-novelistic episodes into the life of such individuals for the purpose of telling a story. Of course it may be argued that such an event was not impossible, and therefore was permissible. Yet if it creates a false impression is it wise to release it?

The point to be determined is: How far can the producer deviate from the known facts in the career of a prominent historical personage for the sake of making his story the more interesting?

And along with this will go the further question: Does deviation of this character, introducing persons or events that never occurred increase the interest? In other words, are not the actual lives of such individuals sufficiently interesting without reading in something which was never there?

For example, there was twice in the life of the person represented in this film when he barely missed capture. Once very near New York, but in each instance he was warned by a grown man of his danger, not by a tiny colored lad. Would it not have been quite as interesting and dramatic to have reproduced one of those episodes in a film intended to represent how he was saved from capture? No false impressions would have been created and there would have been no cause for such criticism as the women made.

This suggestion is made for the benefit of those who will from time to time bring out historical films. There seems to be more of a demand for them than there has been. Producers are asking for them and there is no reason why they should not enjoy constantly increasing popularity. If they are released why not see that they tell the story accurately? There are sufficient dramatic events in the life of any man of importance to allow filming with every assurance that an audience will be interested. They can be instructed in accurate history at the same time.

More of the important events in American history should be put on the screen. It would tend to the cultivation of increased reverence for the country and its institutions. It would inculcate patriotism by presenting a reasonably accurate reproduction of what actually occurred. In other words, it would vitalize history and make it appear as though it were real and not a record of dead, or semi-dead, events. There were real persons in all historic episodes. The mere relation of the dry facts, with the dates, means nothing. It needs the flesh of realism to cause them to stand out as events which really occurred. The motion picture is the vehicle for such presentation. But it should adhere closely to the facts in each case, making them dramatic by presenting them as they happened. Then two purposes would be served and the motion picture would be fulfilling its greatest opportunity. It would be amusing or entertaining and instructing at the same time.

WHERE SHALL WE BE TO-MORROW?

By Margaret I. MacDonald

For several moments I have been sitting at my desk staring vacantly at the big square blotter, and the blank sheet of paper on which up to now I have not written a line. I am not supposed to write on the subject which I am about to mention, others on the staff having done ample justice to the feeling and sentiment of sorrow and sympathy occasioned by the sudden appearance of death in our midst. But while I have endeavored most earnestly to concentrate my thoughts on some one of the motion picture problems of the day, I find my thoughts constantly reverting to the sad calamity: and since they persist in drawing me thitherward I will be content to follow their lead and speak to our readers and friends of the deceased, J. P. Chalmers, the dictates of my heart.

To see a brother or sister torn so suddenly away from this scene of material activity is a shock to every one of us. To view the situation other than as a great bereavement is very difficult since we are surfeited with the material portion of the universe, and since it is so hard to comprehend what the eye is unable to mirror. If we are to believe the teachings of modern religion, the going back to the great consciousness is as freedom gained by a caged bird.

Not long ago I attended a meeting of intelligent men and women. The subject under discussion was "Where are the Dead?" After a number of interesting discourses on the subject the audience was asked to participate in the discussion. An old man arose, stepped to the platform, and stooping picked up a petal that had fallen from the rose worn by one of the feminine speakers.

Said the old man, holding up the petal to view, "I have here in my hand a part of a rose, but the rose is not here. Because I have only a portion of the rose in my hand does not say that the rose itself is not existing somewhere else. And so it is with us; because the body is destroyed is no reason why the spirit cannot live elsewhere: because the tool is broken is no reason why we shall not go elsewhere and find another instrument wherewith to continue our labors: because the temple of the thinker is destroyed is no reason why he shall not find another shelter wherein he may continue to develop."

Continuing after a pause, during which you could have heard a pin drop, he said, "We have listened to a number of speakers to-night on the subject, 'Where Are the Dead?' but as yet no one has advanced any definite idea as to where they really are. The dead—where are they? They are right here on earth. We are the dead—we who are bound hand and foot by physical passions, and hampered by material things. Those whom we call dead are the ones who live—those who have shaken off their cumbersome garments of the flesh and have returned to the infinite from whence they came to the great consciousness which our material state prevents us from fully recognizing."

As the old man took his seat again I did not applaud with the others—I was too deeply impressed.

To-morrow, we too, may go—we may not all be at our desks in the morning. But of one thing we may feel sure; as the falling leaves fertilize the earth, as the moisture of the waters rises to the heavens but to return in refreshing rain or dewdrops, as the seed falls from the withered blossom but to spring forth from winter's winding sheet in the springtime, fresh and rampant with strong new life, so shall the spirit of the dead find pastures green upon which to graze the soul's ambitions unhampered by the cumbrances of the flesh.

Therefore may he who is called rest in peace.

OLD-TIME ROMANCE
(Thanhouser)

It was many years ago and there was a girl. She had two lovers, one a humble soldier and the other a wealthy stranger. She had practically agreed with the soldier to wed him, when the stranger appeared on the scene. It was in Spain, where the blood is hot. The soldier felt outraged and vowed to revenge himself.

SCENE FROM "THE AGITATOR"
American Release, April 4th.

The stranger was arrested as a spy. The girl, loving him, would rescue him and sends him a rope wherewith to make his getaway. About to scale the prison parapet, the stranger is discovered by the soldier. The soldier allows him to descend a little way and then proceeds to cut the rope—and sees the girl below, her arms raised beseechingly to him. His rage is cooled by the power of his love, his knife is withdrawn from the rope—and instead he even fights off the soldiers who would retake the stranger, for he would not have the man come to harm and give her grief. The picture is "A Love of Long Ago," released Tuesday, April 9th, by Thanhouser.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Tom Moore returned from a recent trip to New York with a number of schemes on hand for the spring and summer. He is even planning some things for next season, so as to be sure to be in the lead. He has added the ninth house to the chain of theatres which he controls, that of the Majestic, at one time a melodramatic theatre at cheap prices. In this he will put pictures and specialties for a ten-cent show. The theatre is being renovated and gotten in readiness for the opening about March 18th.

OPERATOR CHAT

By Tom Costello and James Girvan

Aux. Local 35 I. A. T. S. E.

Brother Joseph Greenberg, who handles the projection department of the Palace Theatre, Morristown, N. J., reports that business is very good, and that he has a fine picture business, as he has been operating ten years. I can take his word for having a good picture. His two children, Master Joseph and his sister Ruth, made a big hit in their little vaudeville act at the above theatre, and are the feature vaudeville attraction for next Saturday.

I called on Manager Levy, the hustling manager of the Comet Theatre, No. 100 Third avenue. He reports that he is playing to capacity business, and as he only employes union operators, that in itself is a guarantee that his pictures are par excellence. His new home, The Star, No. 136 Third avenue, will throw its doors open to the public April 10th. It will be one of the cosiest picture-play houses in New York, and will seat 299. His house in Atlantic City is one of the best at the popular resort.

Brother Sam Citron, better known as the fighting operator, seems to be meeting with success in pugilistic circles as he has no trouble in getting matches. He does his training on an Edison machine at Barry's Opera House, Jersey City.

Mr. Goss, the congenial representative of the Inventors' Specialty Manufacturing Company, is meeting with gratifying results in the sale of its Perfection Concave Screen. Managed by the above company the Fourteenth Street Theatre, The Savoy, Thirty-fourth street and Broadway and Ganes Manhattan Theatre, are converts to the Concave, and as all three places cater only to the best, is ample proof that Concave does all that is claimed for it. Mr. Goss has a very pleasing personality, being a convincing talker and a brilliant tactician, and can be found at his office, 1368 Broadway.

Brother Teddy Greenberg is in Rochester this week with the Sarah Bernhardt pictures.

The past week has kept both business representatives very busy supplying operators for local work and road men for the Kinemacolor.

The first annual ball of Local 35, I. A. I. S. E. was held at the Amsterdam Opera House, No. 334 and 344 West Forty-fourth street, Monday evening, March 25th, to a record-breaking attendance. It was a well conducted ball from the grand march to the finishing waltz, and in the wee hours, when the strains of Home Sweet Home was played by Professor Geoghegan's superb orchestra, it was indeed a happy and well satisfied crowd as they departed for home to get a well needed rest, and be ready for the morrow at the different theatres where they manipulate the mystifying effects that produce The rising sun, the waning day, the moonlight's gentle glow. The angry sea and flitting clouds, the storm, the rain and snow. The Actors' fight for the bright spotlight from the mystic heights above they never shirk but do their work, with cable strip and plug. When the cry of strike, they quickly hike, to places quite remote. Or slyly steal to the engine-room to take a little smoke.

In the grand march there were close on to 300 couples, and they went through the most complicated maneuvers in perfect unison, while the spotlights chased the rays of different colored lights over the large assemblage making it a scene of dazzling splendor. A signal from the floor manager, James Lee, assisted by Ed Driscol, of Local No. 35, and Jack Weinick and Sam Sheer, of the Auxiliary, the marchers came to a halt, and had a flashlight taken which I take great pleasure in reproducing in the Moving Picture News.

The I. A. I. S. E. locals of New York, Newark and Jersey City were well represented, not forgetting the ladies, who in their latest creations of silk and satin and pretty faces, gave a master finish to a perfect picture.

The effects were ably handled by Brothers Dill, Morenstein, Wiel and Van Dyke.

The officers that officiated were: John F. Stephens, president; George A. Dove, vice-president; Gus Durkin, secretary-treasurer; John S. Clarke, recording secretary; Harry Koenig, sergeant-at-arms; Harold Williams, business agent.

Trustees: Fred Arnold, Thos. H. Williams, Frank Brennan.

Executive Members: Harry Dignam, Charles Armstrong, James Bacon.

Floor Director: James Lee.

Assistant Floor Director: Ed. Driscoll.

Arrangement Committee: Thos. H. Williams, chairman; John J. Hodgins, James Dignam, Hugh Keenan, Joseph De Brand.

Reception Committee: Frank Brennan, chairman; Chas. Le Brecht, William Austin, Arthur Kyle, Harry Dignam, Emil R. Lukatis, Joseph Edson, Harry Watcher.

Floor Committee: James Bacon, chairman; George Geoghegan, Michael Davey, Sam Soltzman, Chas. Armstrong, Fred Arnold, John Callahan, Chas. Woodbridge.

Among the guests could be seen many faces familiar to Broadway audiences. And I had the extreme pleasure of meeting Master Larry Sylvester, of the Sylvester Lawrence Trio, conceded to be one of the most versatile children on the American stage, and to meet him when he is not engaged making theatregoers scream at his quaint comedy and applaud his sweet childish voice is to meet a perfect little gentleman. There was enough comedy during the ball to keep the large assemblage in good spirits. Brother Wm. McVey, whose height is well under 5 feet, in his anxiety to keep step in the grand march caused a very disastrous fall, followed quickly by Brother Frank Le Lagan, who tips the beam at 300 pounds. I sympathize with both brothers, but accidents will happen especially on a well polished ballroom floor. Brother Hugey Keenan was very much in evidence with his newly wedded bride, and Brother Wm. Sweeney and his intended were the smallest couple in the hall. In concluding I can say it was a grand success from every point, and I will look with pleasure to attend the next ball of Local 35.

TOM COSTELLO AUX. LoCAL 35.

Brother Phil Levine, who has charge of the operating room at the Lyric Theatre, 166th street and Third avenue, is putting on a fine show. His outfit consists of a Powers No. 6 with all the latest attachments, and the manager is to be congratulated on having such a good and such a well equipped theatre.

Even Roosevelt has made his bow to the motion picture camera! 'Tis said that during an address made by him in the auditorium at Portland, Me., twenty-six arc lamps burned all during the meeting for the benefit of motion picture men. It may be only a press agent yarn—we are not repeating it on authority.

Moving pictures are to be used in the campaign for better wagon roads in the Middle West. They will be supplanted by displays of lantern slides in every village and hamlets in several states by those who are eager to see the state enter upon an era of good roads building. These plans have been decided upon by the Good Roads Federation of Ohio and elsewhere. It is proposed to show pictures of better road building and automobiles will be used to transport the picture show equipments. If through cinematography, the people of the Middle West can be educated to the importance of better roads, much can be placed to the credit of the animated picture. Good roads are of prime importance to man and beast and automobile.

When Mr. Mann looks out and sees
The glint of sunshine on the trees
He packs his traps and says "I'll roam,"

When Mrs. Jones hates the cares
Of home and for a scene prepares

To the picture shows she's bent!

And when the vernal days draw near,
The hired man shirks his toil severe
And turns up peevish, more or less—
Picture shows to blame, I guess!

The two greatest amusement enterprises of Uncle Sam's domain, baseball and the moving picture business, are to be probed by the Department of Justice. According to statistics, the national game is first and cinematography is second in the hearts of our countrymen. It is to be ascertained if there isn't a "trust" in both pastimes. We trust not! The National and American Leagues on the baseball side, are to come under the Department of Justice's searchlight, while, it is asserted, that the Motion Picture Patents Company is in for a shaking down on the moving picture side of the fence.

With all due regard to the Sherman law, Wickersham and the rest, there are two "Trusts" which are popular with the rank and file. If trusts these be, well, they are good trusts. Let 'em alone, Wick, old chap!

What other trust, so-called, takes a coal miner or a plasterer earning about $2 daily, puts him to work for about two hours' daily batting thrown balls, and pays him from $3,500 to $10,000 for six months' exercise?

What other trust, so-called, spends hundreds of thousands of dollars to search the ends of the earth for the unusual and educational and serves up the life portrayals to the people, an hour's entertainment for five cents?

Verily to the C. P. (meaning Common People) there are numerous big business ventures that can well be probed before baseball or cinematography is harassed.

"Put on your hat, Hortense, and let's go to the picture show!"

The determination of moving picture shows to keep open in Delaware, Ohio, has precipitated a fight that is interesting thousands of exhibitors. To avoid arrests, the theatre makes no admission charge, puts on educational films and leaves to the visitor whether he cares to make a contribution after seeing the show. The Civic League, the City Council and clergymen are taking a hand in the fight to close the show.

One of the most effective lessons taught by the moving picture film is the repulsive nature of impure water. The actual movements of the animalcual are shown in enlarged form to the disgust of the beholder. The same sort of demonstration is now being made to convince dealers of the unwholesomeness of decayed meats. It would be possible to convince the butchers by permitting them to look through the microscope but the process is long and tedious compared with the flashing of the films on a screen before a room full of men.

Medical associations in many sections of the West are showing by the medium of the moving picture the dangerous bacilli which lurk in impure water. Samples of drinking water drawn from old wells and cisterns are shown, together with necessary processes of distillation. The exhibitions are believed by some physicians to be the most important yet utilized by means of cinematography. Typhoid fever and other contagious diseases are made preventable by educating the communities in the importance of pure water and individual towel and drinking cups.

We had been wondering why some enterprising manufacturer did not utilize Mark Twain's "Huckleberry Finn" and "Tom Sawyer," for the moving picture screen when, lo, and behold, the notification came that Mark Twain's works were to be filmed. Louisa Alcott's "Little Women," dear to the hearts of the girls, has been dramatized. Now the adventures of "Huck Finn" and "Tom Sawyer" are to be filmed to the delight of the boys. Elders, too, will view these film stories with pleasure. We well remember the hours we spent with "Huck Finn," "Tom Sawyer," "Indian Joe," "Aunt Polly" and the rest, and we are not as yet too old to occasionally turn the leaves of these juvenile books. If faithfully presented, "Huckleberry Finn" and "Tom Sawyer" will prove immensely popular and a credit to cinematography.

Say, do you remember "Huck Finn's" cure for warts? You take a dead black cat into a graveyard in the dark of the moon, swing it toward a stump, at the same time repeating these calibastic words:

"Barley-corn, barley-corn,
Injun meal shorts.
Stump water, stump water,
Swaller these warts."

While filming Mark Twain, why not turn attention to the Western stories of Bret Harte? Harte's stories of the halycon California days of '49 are classics and compare favorably with Poe's short stories for plot, incident and perfect diction. "The Luck of Roaring Camp," for instance, would go great. Enough ideas have been stolen from Harte in the past, so why not make a feature reel or two from his Western stories by arrangements with his publishers.

Oh, that's all right; you are welcome to this idea, also!

FIRE AT THE MINE

BY VIRGINIA WEST

Adapted from Gaumont Release

FROM every direction the little paths led to the mine, making a spider web over the bare unbeautiful country.

Very shortly after daylight the men began to emerge from their homes. One by one they came out into the half light and took each a separate path that led ultimately to the same spot.

The houses stood in rows of six; each house exactly like its neighbors; each row exactly like the row above and the row below. Even the red paint on each house was of the same dulness, scarcely red at all now. One would think a man would have to count to know where he lived.

On the porch of one of these tiny houses a young miner lingered. His arm was around his young wife and she looked lovingly up into his face. She made so bright a spot in those sordid surroundings that the men turned their heads to look and to wonder as they passed by the gate.

One man only did not turn his head, and yet the picture was burned upon his brain as with a branding iron. In his imagination he had seen it a hundred times. Yet, he could not get used to it, and always in his heart was a yearning and in his eyes a bitter defiance of the world he looked out upon—the only world he knew—which had kept from him the one thing he had ever really wanted.

At half past five the names had all been registered at the office and the lamps given out. Then the descent commenced. Cage after cage carried its load of men into the blackness of the mine. The day's work began.

At twelve o'clock the men sat down to eat their lunches by the light of their lamps. They were scattered in groups along the many galleries of the mine. The conversations of the different groups were in many languages but the topic was more or less the same in most of them.

What was the matter with Conors, one man asked. Didn't he know? And then a dozen were ready to tell him how Conors loved Lintzow's wife—had loved her before her marriage and how, even now, when she had been married to Lintzow for two months he was still mad for her.

Oh, well, he'd find another woman, thought one man, but a second was not so sure of that.

The man of whom they spoke sat apart from the group of men with which he had been working, and ate his lunch in silence. What was the use, he thought, of joining his comrades? There was but one thought in his mind and of that he could not speak.

Honestly and bravely the fellow had fought with himself since he knew that his case was hopeless as far as winning the girl was concerned. At first he had thought of death but the face of his old mother came before him and he put the thought from his mind. Who would care for her if he were not there? So he went on from day to day, fighting the longing in his heart—not knowing the best way, and always failing.

After the men had returned to their work and it was progressing as usual, there was suddenly heard a loud booming. The men, as one man, dropped their picks and other tools and hurried to the shaftroom. In their panic they crushed each other and themselves against the projecting coal.

From every direction the frightened miners hurried along the galleries. The sound of falling coal and the smell of gas reached them from the distant rooms.

The ascent began. The men knew nothing—most of them—but the wild desire to reach the light and air. The cars were crowded and as they left the mine men clung to them and begged to be taken up.

In the last car load was Conors, one of the few who had not lost his self-control.

The sound of the explosion, muffled as it was to those outside the mine, reached the women in the dull red houses in the rows. They all stood for a moment, terror-stricken, and then began a rush for the mine. The old women knew the sound because they had heard it before and the younger ones knew, and were frightened, by instinct.

By the time the last cage came to the light there had gathered a crowd of white-faced women. Some, as soon as they could not find their men, thronged the office. They demanded to know how many men had come up, where the explosion was and how bad it was.

The men and women were both so excited that they could not find those who belonged to them.

"The names!" cried the women. "Tell us the names of those who are in the mine."

"For God's sake make them keep quiet," cried the superintendent. "I'll try to call the roll."

One of the overseers tried to quiet the women who kept repeating with white lips, "The names, the names!"

Some of those who had found their men were sobbing hysterically. . . .

After many efforts the superintendent succeeded in calling the roll.

"There is only one man missing," he said.

"The name, the name!" they cried.

For a moment the man hesitated; he shrank from dealing the blow to the woman whose man it was.

"The name," they cried again.

"Lintzow."

An almost imperceptible sigh of relief escaped from many of the women. There was no cry uttered, but at the edge of the crowd a silent woman sank to the ground.

In a moment Conors had gently put aside his mother and hastened to the girl's side.

"Mary," he said, as he raised her, "don't give up hope. Maybe he's all right. I'm goin' down to find out."

"But, John, you can't go! You'll get killed," she cried in a low voice, "and—and why should you?" she added.

"You mean because you threw me over for him?" He took the trembling hands in his. "I love you and you love him—that's why I'm goin' down."

"Oh John——" she began tearfully, but he did not wait. Turning to the superintendent his whole expression changed. He realized that they might try to prevent his descent.

"I am going down after Lintzow," he said, and his tone and expression were such that even the superintendent made no move to restrain him.

"It's madness, man," he said as Conors stepped into the cage.

There were little lines of smoke along the ground where cracks had been made and the people began to move back.

All but Mary. She ran to Conors and threw herself into his arms just as they were making ready to lower the cage.

"Take me, too," she sobbed.

The man put her gently aside. "Mary," he said, "go to my mother, and promise me that if anything happens to me you will look after her."

"Oh don't, John," she cried, but he repeated, "Promise me," and she promised.

When the car was about to start the superintendent said to Conors:

"If you will go, man, you must have help at least to the shaftroom. I'll go with you."

Conors said nothing and in a moment the two men disappeared from the view of the crowd.

Then the weary waiting began. In silence they stood, excepting a stifled sob now and then. Even the children stood big-eyed, without uttering a sound.

Suddenly they knew by the actions of the men at the shaft that a hurried signal had been given. Forgetting their fear they pressed forward. The superintendent staggered from the car with a man in his arms. The man was alive and conscious but his legs hung useless.

Two men sprang into the cage and lifted the body of a lifeless man. As they laid him on the ground the miners took off their caps and bowed their heads.

"Mary," sobbed Lintzow, "he loved you more than I knew. He gave his life for your sake."

"Tears streamed down the girl's face as she held her husband to her breast.

By the body of the other man knelt the old mother.

"My boy," she murmured, "my boy."

When Mary laid her hand on the old woman's shoulder and said to her with choking voice: "Come, you must be our mother now," she only shook her head and answered "It won't be for long," and, as she allowed herself to be led away, again and again, "My boy, my boy."

THE DEFENDER OF THE NAME

BY VIRGINIA WEST

Adapted from the Rex Release

IN the restless, feverish days just before the outbreak of the Civil War, Beverly Potter was stricken with an incurable malady. He knew that his days were few and he took what opportunity he had to talk to his son, John Randolph, on the subject which lay nearest his heart—his family name and honor.

Laying his hand on his son's head, he said to him: "My boy, the name of Potter is one of the proudest in Virginia, as well as one of the oldest. Your mother also comes from distinguished people, you know. The Randolphs are a fine family. As far back as the records go both families have only honor written after their names.

"John, my son, I want you to remember this and feel that it is your especial privilege, as well as your duty, to uphold that honor always. You will follow in the path of the men of our families—the strong, brave men who fought for their liberty in the Revolution and those who have stood ready to fight for it ever since. I am sure that my son realizes what has been bequeathed him."

The lad was sitting by his father's bed. He arose and threw back his head proudly. His eyes shone and his delicate nostrils quivered as he said: "Yes, father, I have read the history of our men and their deeds, and I know that a boy could have no finer inheritance. I am proud that I have the opportunity of upholding the honor of such families. If I should ever bring a stain to our name I should not want to live another day."

"Well spoken, my boy. I feel that I can trust you."

Soon after this conversation Beverly Potter passed away.

Often the boy thought of his father's words, and secretly he longed for an opportunity to prove that he had a right to the name he bore, more than the mere right of birth.

When the news spread that Sumter had been fired upon it was realized that the South must fight for her honor, reluctant as most of her sons were to enter into that bloody conflict against their brothers.

Enthusiasm ran high in John's blood. He felt that the looked-for opportunity had come.

"Mother, I must go!" he said over and over again in answer to her plea that he was too young.

"Wait a year," she said. "You are only eighteen; they do not need you now.'

"But I am old enough and I must go," he answered. Then proudly: "Would those men whose blood is in my veins have hesitated? I am my father's oldest son and now that he is gone the family honor is in my hands. It must not be said of my father's son that he did less than his father would have done."

"He is right, mother. He must go." It was Ruth, his sister, who spoke. She had said nothing before, waiting for the boy to volunteer of his own free will—but waiting with a throbbing heart.

"Yes, yes, I see," cried the mother, "you must go. But it is so very hard," she said, drawing the boy's head to her breast.

So John Randolph Potter went to war and his mother and sister, like hundreds of other women, stayed at home and waited.

Ruth was twenty years old and a beautiful type of Southern young womanhood.

Much of her time was spent during these terrible days sitting with a negro woman making bandages and lint, her mother being busy with the younger children.

When an opportunity offered the girl was always ready to nurse the wounded soldiers of both the North and the South.

One day the mother and daughter were filled with great excitement. John's company had pitched camp in the neighborhood. This enabled them to see the lad often and to be sure of his safety at least for the present.

Very soon the report reached them that Union forces were moving southward from Washington. Their plans were not known, but it was supposed that these troops were coming as re-enforcements to those already in camp near by.

There was one thing that must be done; the plans of the Union Army must be known.

One morning John burst in upon his mother and sister, excited and breathless. His face was flushed and his eyes shining.

"Mother," he panted, "I must speak to you and sister alone."

Mrs. Potter nodded to the colored girl who sat near her sewing and she left the room.

"Oh, mother, I am so excited," said the boy hurriedly. "The duty of securing the Union plans has been assigned to me."

"My boy!"

"Oh, John!"

"Yes, isn't it wonderful? I can scarcely believe it, but I am so happy."

The mother sat silent for a moment, her face pale and her hands tightly clasped. It was only for a moment, and she had soon gained control of herself. Drawing the boy down beside her on the sofa, she said in a low, even voice: "Tell us all about it, dear. How did it happen? Why did they give such an important duty to such a young soldier?"

"I don't know, mother, only the Major said that he had watched me and had noticed how careful I was and how strictly I obeyed orders, and so he thought I would carry out this important thing to the letter."

"I am very proud," answered his mother, but——" her eyes filled with tears. "But I am a woman and you are my boy and—and I am a little afraid."

"But he will succeed, mother. He must succeed." Ruth's eyes were wide and bright. "Besides, think what it means for him to be entrusted with such a mission. If it is impossible for him to get the papers, at least he will do his duty as well as any man could do it. Of that I am certain."

In her youthful enthusiasm the girl flung her arms about her brother's neck.

The boy's belief in himself and his anxiety to be about his task were greatly strengthened by his visit to his home. When it was decided that the mission should be undertaken that very night the young soldier was more than glad.

At sunset, disguised as a Union soldier, John set out by a roundabout way to reach his destination. His plan was to find an opportunity to mingle with a number of soldiers as they were preparing for the night, and then watch for his chance to locate and get possession of the papers.

Just as he was about to emerge from a clump of bushes, at the edge of a clearing, he heard voices. Cautiously peeping between the branches, he saw in the space before him a little squad of Union soldiers.

At that moment, he could not have told why, but a feeling of depression—almost of fear—came over him.

It was not long until the boy knew why.

The little squad separated and in their midst stood a man blindfolded. An officer gave an order and the men lined up. One word came to the concealed lad's ears: "Fire!"

A loud report sounded and from the muzzle of twelve guns burst clouds of smoke. On the ground lay the body of a spy.

A spy! He had been caught, that was all. Caught doing a service to his people—doing his duty. He was killed because he was caught—just that and nothing more.

Slowly these thoughts went through the boy's mind and yet they seemed to mean nothing to him.

Suddenly a light seemed to break. He was a spy! He was in great danger of being caught, and if they caught him he would be shot down like a dog as that other man had been.

Panic seized him. Forgotten were his mission, his courage, his honor and the honor of that man whose son he was.

It had grown dark now and he tripped and fell over the roots across his path and struck his body against the trees as he sped through the woods. No definite thought was in his mind, only the knowledge that he must get away from the sight he had just witnessed—away from the possibility of another scene like that. Only to get away—to safety.

When he reached his home all was quiet and the house was in complete darkness, excepting a light which shone from Ruth's window.

John crept up the stairway and into his sister's room.

"John!" she cried in alarm when she had seen his face. "John, what has happened? Tell me—quick!"

"I am frightened," he gasped. "They sent me—tonight. I saw a spy—shot!"

The boy dropped on the floor, his face buried in his arms.

Ruth stood for a moment looking at him in horror. Then she said slowly: "You mean you were afraid and ran away from your duty?"

"Yes," he whispered.

"Coward!"

John slowly raised himself from the floor.

"Don't, Ruth. I—oh, help me! Tell me what to do!"

"There is but one thing to do to save your honor. Go!" She pointed to the door.

Trembling, the boy arose and staggered out of the room.

Ruth sank down upon her bed and covered her face.

Suddenly she jumped to her feet. What was that? She knew and yet she dared not think. Swiftly but noiselessly she ran down the stairs and out into the yard.

Yes, she was right. There he lay upon the grass—dead.

Instantly Ruth realized what her brother's death meant. Dishonor! The first in all their long line to cast a shadow on the family name.

The girl stood beside the still form and with her face lifted to the stars whispered: "Oh, God, help me to do it." With a face set and white she went forward into the darkness.

She did not stop until she reached the Union lines. Then, watching her chance, she slipped past the sentry and into the camp. She knew her way, for she had visited the place by daylight.

In many years there are a few almost unbelievable things that happen. On this night there was one of them.

The girl kept in the shadows and waited many a weary hour for her opportunity. At last it came. Only for a moment, but in that moment she seized the precious package which she felt sure must contain the papers she was risking her life to gain possession of.

When she reached home again she fell almost exhausted beside the body of her brother.

"I will save your honor, John. They shall never know," she panted in the ear of the lifeless boy.

But her task was not yet done. Painfully, and at times almost without hope, she dragged the body of the dead boy to the outposts of the Confederate lines. It was not far, but the girl's strength would have stood no more.

Leaving the young soldier lying on the ground with the papers clutched in his stiffening hand, she crept slowly back to her room.

At dawn they found him, and great was the praise of the young hero who had dragged himself, mortally wounded, to a place where he knew the papers would be found—the papers for which he gave his life.

An Enterprising Organization

The Mutual Film Corporation has been organized under the laws of Delaware for the purpose of engaging throughout the United States in the Film Exchange business. The business of the film exchange is to buy the film made by the various manufacturers and to rent it to the theatre proprietors.

The Mutual Film Corporation is not organized for the purpose of antagonizing any person or group of persons in the moving picture business. It is not a new faction as has been reported. It is simply an organization of gentlemen who have heretofore, and for years, been engaged in the film exchange business with profit, and who are desirous of extending the business and improving conditions in certain localities. They believe that with an organization such as the Mutual Film Corporation, which has sound financial resources, the conditions of the business could be improved, and better service given to the exhibitors, and better pictures shown to the public.

The object of the gentlemen interested in Mutual Film Corporation is not to antagonize, but to co-operate with every manufacturer, film exchange and exhibitor who is working for the true, permanent interest of the film business.

H. E. Aitken is the vice-president of the company.

THE MYSTERY OF SOULS

Great Northern Special Feature Film Company

A Thrilling Drama Full of Powerful Incidents Brilliantly Performed by Clever Actors

Avarice leads to the betrayal of a sacred trust, to conspiracy, crime, humiliation and death. Many of the vital incidents hinge upon that mysterious phenomenon, hypnotic influence. The heroine's happy issue out of all afflictions forms a cheerful offset and poetically just conclusion to dark chapters of a dramatic story.

CHARACTERS: Frank Alberti; Lydia, his ward; Bernard and Fritz, unscrupulous scoundrels; Lucien Vernon, Lydia's rescuer.

The Plot

Frank Alberti is the guardian of Lydia, and according to his brother's will, in the event of her death will be enriched by her fortune. As we watch him thinking deeply in his study, it is clear that evil thoughts are working in his brain. The demon of greed takes possession of him, and he plots the destruction of Lydia in order to enjoy her fortune. He chooses as instrument for his purpose one Bernard, an unscrupulous scoundrel. It is agreed that Lydia is to be murdered; but Bernard intends keeping her alive so that he may use his power to extort money from Alberti.

The Crime

In pursuance of the plot, Alberti takes Lydia to the seaside, and while there proposes a pleasure jaunt in a boat. Bernard, disguised as a boatman, puts the little party into his craft and rows them out to sea. When the boat is well away from the shore Bernard pulls the plug out of the bottom, the boat fills with water and rapidly sinks. Alberti, who is prepared for this, dives into the water, and with a friend of his swims to the shore. Then follows one of the most astonishing pictures ever seen, viz., a rescue under water. Lydia is seen sinking down, still deeper down, in the green water. With a frantic effort she rises, but again sinks. Shooting through the filmy depths comes Bernard on rescue bent. He seizes the by-now-exhausted heroine, and rises to the surface. Swimming with his burden to the rocks, he clambers to a spot where a boat has been waiting for him. The unconscious Lydia is placed in the boat and rapidly rowed to a convenient landing stage, being then carried to a waiting motor and hurried off to Vienna.

The Consequences

Alberti returns home, and as his friend was witness to the tragic accident resulting in the drowning of Lydia, no suspicion rests upon the guilty man. Amid the condolence of his friends he succeeds in preserving an appropriately grief-stricken countenance. An unpleasant duty has yet to be performed, viz., the payment of Bernard. In handing over the money Alberti makes it clear that he does not wish either to see or hear any more of his rascally confederate. Bernard goes off to Vienna intent on having a good time, and Alberti is left to enjoy the gold so guiltily acquired. Bernard is possessed of remarkable hypnotic power, and on reaching the house where Lydia is held prisoner he subjects her to his influence. Bernard is accompanied by his accomplice, Fritz, and the pair meeting an Englishman, Vernon, invite him to the gambling tables, hoping to enrich themselves. Luck is against them, and it is Vernon who wins. Having lost all his money, Bernard resolves to get Vernon into his power. Acting under his suggestion, Lydia decoys Vernon away and induces him to drink some drugged wine. It is enthralling to witness the clever acting which simulates so well a hypnotized person's movements. Behind the girl we see a vision of the sinister figure of Bernard, master of her soul, impelling her to crime. Vernon having drunk the wine is overcome.

Lydia Rescued

In the gambling saloon below, Bernard quarrels with another at the table and receives a blow which stuns him. Thus rendered unconscious, his influence over Lydia is gone, and with a start she recovers her faculties. In frantic anxiety she succeeds in arousing the stupified Vernon to a sense of the dangers of his situation. A rope of curtains is hastily improvised, and Vernon escapes by way of a window. Lydia is about to follow, but at this moment Bernard, in the saloon below, recovers consciousness. His influence is at once re-established. His shadowy form is seen again, and after a brief, but pathetic struggle, Lydia's brain is again made captive. Vernon, dazed and horrified, staggers along the street and succeeds in getting assistance to raid the place where Lydia is confined. Bernard and Fritz, however, escape by a secret passage, through which they had intended to make away with the body of Vernon. Lydia is rescued, but in her hypnotized state all efforts to help her or to extract information are frustrated.

Humiliation

Without money and in desperate straits, Bernard telegraphs for Alberti to come at once to Vienna. He receives the message, and at first spurns it, but a guilty conscience whispers that he dare not refuse. It is humiliating to know that he is at the mercy of villains, but he must go. Anticipating that money is the object, he takes a liberal supply of notes with him. Bernard meets him at the station, but fate has decreed that Vernon, who intends leaving Vienna, should see them both. He at once follows them to an inn, and then calls the police. It is clear that no love is lost between the three conspirators. A heated argument takes place, and under the influence of threatening looks and gestures Alberti is induced to part with more money.

Death

Just as he is on the point of handing the money over the police break into the room. There is a short, fierce encounter, in which shots are fired. Bernard is killed, Fritz escapes, and Alberti is conducted to the police station. With the death of Bernard, Lydia is once more released from his influence. She makes her way to the room where Alberti is being interrogated by the officer in charge. The guilty man believes her to be the ghost of his ward. The shock is more than he can bear; in an agony of terror he repulses her affectionate advances, and expires.

Time flies, and we see Lydia and Vernon strolling amidst the picturesque scenery at the seaside, and it is clear that the future will be brighter for Lydia than the past has been.

NOTES OF THE WEEK

THE Philadelphia, Pa., Sunday Dispatch and the Chicago, Ill., Daily News seem to be rather at variance in the way of opinions expressed in these two well-known news vehicles, on the matter of the moving picture theatre. Needless to say, the Sunday Dispatch is associating with the cobwebs of a dead past so far as the moving picture theatre is concerned. Read the following:

"We are glad to see that a battle has been started by theatrical producers and play writers against the motion picture interests of the country before the House Committee on Patents at Washington. It was brought about by the Townsend bill to relieve motion picture producers of damages for pictorial reproduction of copyrighted plays. This was clearly an invasion of the rights of the play producers by the picture film companies and it is no wonder they kicked.

"The theatrical business has been practically ruined in every city and State in the Union by the motion picture houses, which are under very little expense, are in all cases let off with the payment of a very light license or none at all, and can thus afford to give an entertainment for a few pennies admission that would not pay for the gas bills or the electric light in a regular theatre. It is bad enough for the theatres to be underbid for public patronage in this way without the picture houses stealing the ideas of plays for which the theatrical managers in most cases have had to pay a large lump sum or important royalties.

"Instead of trying to aid the 'movies' our lawmakers would do better to root them out entirely, for in most cases these houses are a nuisance and a menace to public health, morals and life itself."—Philadelphia, Pa., Sunday Dispatch.

And then read what "Ohrenstein" in the Chicago Daily News has to say:

"If a moving picture theatre is constructed in accordance with the ordinances of the city of Chicago there certainly can be no more healthful place for a child to spend its time. As regards the pictures, they are under the censorship of the police and I can't see why, if the house is safe from fire, rowdies and other objectionable features, a child cannot be allowed to attend one of these houses unescorted, providing the parents feel that the child will get home in a safe manner.

"These moving picture houses are the greatest means of amusement for people of small income, both young and old. Any young man can get good, clean amusement in them, instead of spending his time in bars and billiard rooms, and for much less money. The young women can safely go there unattended.

"It is not up to the people to see that these amusement places are properly conducted or the pictures of a proper kind. This is up to the police authorities. I have been to many motion picture shows and have never found anything of a nature that would have a tendency to keep any one from attending." OHRENSTEIN.

The following taken from the report of John C. Delaney, Chief Factory Inspector, printed in the Philadelphia Record of March 17th, are words wisely spoken: "The next Legislature should place a ban on shows filled with murderous cowboys and impossible Indians."

"In struggling with the moving picture problem the censorship is dealing with nine-tenths of the total theatre problem. Moving pictures are now the most important form of cheap amusement in the country. They reach the young, immigrants, family groups, the formative and impressionable section of our cities as no other form of amusement, and cannot but be vital influences for ill or good. They are the only theatre which it is possible for the entire family of the wage worker to attend. In their social and educational possibilities they provide the basis for a neighborhood theatre of the people."—Muskegon, Mich., Chronicle.

Arthur Cox and George Kappler, of Welland, Ont., both under 18 years of age, have constructed a machine for taking moving pictures. It has proved a success. Their only tools were a hammer and a saw. The film is very expensive and to meet this the youthful inventors have made arrangements with a local moving picture theatre to show their pictures.

The Powers Motion Picture Company's organization in New Mexico has secured a splendid picture of scenes on the Mexican border, showing the United States troops who are protecting Uncle Sam's interests in that troublesome locality. This film is already dated for release.

The Powers people desire to announce to exhibitors that they are giving away handsome sepia toned photographs, 9 x 11, of eight of their leading players. Any exhibitor may have them upon application and the payment of a nominal sum sufficient to cover the cost of mailing.

Mr. John D. Tippitts has left New York for a tour to Mexico, Cuba, Porto Rico and the West Indies in the interests of the famous photo-plays, Bernhardt in "Camille" and Rejane in "Sans Gene," whose North American rights are owned by the French-American Film Company, of New York.

So many inquiries for the rights in these countries have been received by the French-American Film Company that it thought best to send Mr. Tippitts to negotiate with the numerous bidders on the ground.

Rear-Admiral Hugo Osterhaus, in the approaching target practice and manœuvres of the Atlantic fleet on the Southern drill ground, has issued orders that practically all of the battleships and cruisers could be stripped down to fightingcon dition, eliminating all woodwork and other inflammable material.

Motion picture and camera men have been designated, and pictures will be a bulky part of the report on the work of the spring.

Plans are on foot to have a motion picture made of the April "run" of Abd-er Rahman Caravan No. 1. Order of the Alhambra. Two sir nobles, members of a well-known film concern, are co-operating with the officials of the local branch. The grand commander, Joseph T. Gleason, suggested the plan at a meeting of the Divan held on Tuesday evening at the K. of C. Institute. The dictaphone will also play a part in this ritualistic innovation, so that the members of other caravans where the pictures will be displayed will have a chance to hear every word, as well as watch each movement of the famous Abd-er Rahman degree corps.

Motion pictures of insects in flight prove that the movement of the wings of all insects presents the same general character. When flight is begun the amplitude of the first wing beats is much smaller than the subsequent ones, but the period remains almost unchanged. The insect regulates the velocity of its flight not by the rapidity of the motion of its wings, but by changing their inclination. Although in normal conditions the period of the wing beat remains constant, it may be increased or diminished by various influences, such as fatigue and cold.

* * * *

At last we have the sanitary film. Sanitation, after attacking almost everything else in the world, has begun an assault on the motion picture ribbon.

Not that the film is to be antiseptic, germ proof, or sterilized. But it is to be manicured. If the lead of the Edison Company is followed there will be no more films with dirt, so to speak, under their finger nails.

The idea is to illuminate what are called "rainy" films. Any motion picture habitue will understand at once what a rainy film is. The black scratches that cover the picture are black because they are filled with dirt. The dirt cannot be washed out of the ordinary film with soap and water. The scenery, actors, motion, and plot would all go with the dirt. Cleaning fluids are almost as bad as water, ruining the film within a short time.

The Edison Company has been issuing washable films. These can be given a bath and a rub down whenever necessary. The only trouble is that the dealers in general have neglected to wash the washable film. There being no ordinance to enforce sanitation, sanitation has been neglected. The makers of the cleanable-film implore the public to demand that it be washed because, clean, it does not give the eye strain that a rainy, oil stained film does.

Houston, Texas, is to have a municipal moving picture show as well as municipal band. Both features will be free to the public. The band will play nightly in the summer in the parks, while in the winter the band and orchestra will give free concerts in the new $400,000 municipal auditorium. The band also will be available for boosting delegations.

The moving picture show will be installed in the auditorium. Films will be shown Sunday afternoons and nights, both summer and winter. Lectures and other forms of entertainment will be provided.

While other cities have municipal bands, the moving picture show is believed to be an innovation in municipal enterprise.

According to the N. Y. Tribune competition among the moving picture film companies has become so keen that different concerns handling foreign productions are invoking every precaution guaranteed them by the copyright laws to prevent other companies from importing the same or similar pictures. One firm has informed the Second Assistant Postmaster General that it was sending to Washington for copyright a three-roll feature film made in Paris which it intended to exhibit in the United States at an early date.

"We have information that attempts will be made to import piratical copies of this film," the firm said, "and we would respectfully request that you notify all customs ports to prevent such importation through the mail."

At a meeting of delegates representing the National Association of Managers, Actors and Playwrights, in Berlin last week, resolutions were adopted calling for severe measures to repress the growth of cinematograph theatres. It was the general opinion that moving pictures ought to serve the interests of science and education only, and ought not to be permitted to invade the realm of the drama.

Reports from 120 theatres, in all parts of the country, were read, showing that the "kintopps," as the motion picture establishments are called in Germany, have brought the theatre business to the brink of ruin.

A real, practical Christianity is being practiced by the Men's Bible Class of the First Church of Christ, in Akron, O. The class, started a few months ago, outgrew its quarters in the church, then rented a theater for its Sunday morning meetings. Rev. George Darsie is its teacher, Aaron Rubright its president, and Fred Leu its hustling young press agent. Bible lessons are taught by stereoptican and motion pictures, with a general discussion between teacher and class.

The world is not in need of the moving picture representation of assassination, crime, horror, suffering. There is quite enough of that in real life, and its duplication on the moving picture stage is quite unnecessary, even for the profit of the film manufacturers.

Houston, Texas, is following Denver's lead and is going to regale the populace of the city with free Sunday moving picture shows. These will be held in the new city auditorium which seats about 8,000 persons.

It seems very much of a pity that the Independents were so poorly represented at the Indiana Moving Picture Exhibitors' League. The only Independent manufactory represented there, so it seems, was the American Film Mfg. Company, Mr. R. R. Nehls, manager of that company being present.

About seventy-five exhibitors and exchange men from Indiana were present and the members of the league were quite justified in feeling that the importance of the meeting warranted the attendance of manufacturers.

Mr. Nehls secured the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday for a private exhibition of American productions to an enthusiastic audience, who crowded the theatre to the doors.

The "Flying A" is using large space in seventy-two daily newspapers throughout the country.

After being entirely redecorated and renovated the Broad Street Theatre, Trenton, New Jersey, passes into the hands of three well-known New York theatrical men Monday, April 8th, for a long term of years.

E. L. Perry, formerly of the Shubert Theatrical Company; William H. Currie, of Broadhurst and Currie, the producing firm, and Frank Brassell, till lately a Wall Street broker, are the lessees.

The policy of the theatre will be first-class photo-play and five acts of vaudeville changing every Monday and Thursday. As the seating capacity is 1,600, ten, fifteen and twenty-five cent prices will be charged. A ladies' concert orchestra of ten pieces will be one of the features as well as a costly pipe organ to accompany certain photo-plays and illustrated songs.

The company will be known as the Broad Street Theatre Company and a chain of houses throughout New Jersey and Pennsylvania is planned for the near future. Ladies' writing rooms, female ushers, an art gallery and children's play rooms are but a few of the innovations which the Trenton theatre-goers will be offered and the management will be most liberal in its novel ideas.

The theatre has been built but a few months and is the largest and most up-to-date in modern appliances in the city.

"Congress has not a high opinion of literature, music and the plastic arts," says the Saturday Evening Post. "If Michelangelo had produced his statue of Moses under the protection of our copyright law, and somebody had stolen and sold a copy of it, he would have found that the law estimated his damages at ten dollars. Our law would suggest the same sum to Leonardo as damages for a larcenous copy of his Mona Lisa—thus probably reconciling him, if he were still living, to the outright theft of that masterpiece from the Louvre last year. The commercial value of the Sermon on the Mount, under the copyright law, would be fifty dollars.

Congressman Townsend, of New Jersey, proposes a further cheapening of literature. A bill introduced by him provides that, in case of the infringement of a copyrighted work by a moving-picture show, "where the defendant proves that he was not aware that he was infringing a copyrighted work and could not reasonably have foreseen that he was so infringing, the entire recovery by the copyright proprietor shall not exceed one hundred dollars," until after a notice has been served upon the moving-picture man that he is infringing a copyright.

The argument is that some dishonest person may, at any time, build a moving-picture play upon a copyrighted story and sell it to an innocent producer who is not aware of the infringement. Under this bill, the moving-picture man would be practically absolved from any obligation to find out whether a copyright was infringed. He could buy anything offered him, and be sure that no matter what copyright he infringed or how seriously his infringement might damage the real author, his liability would be limited to one hundred dollars.

In contrast with the tariff, we are decidely in favor of revising the copyright law upward—not downward. ?

There are now over 4,000 moving picture theatres in Great Britain and Ireland. Fully $5,000,000 is said to be invested in the provision and working of halls alone, and over 32,000 people are employed. This leaves out of account the development of auxiliary branches of the industry. A total of 2,000,000 people represents approximately the daily audience at these picture shows.

For the purpose of regulating the moving picture business in the section of Comerford, Pa., the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Northeastern Pennsylvania was organized March 15th, at Hotel Casey. The association is a branch of the national organization, which is made up of nickelet owners in the larger cities. The plan of the association, it was stated, is to elevate the tone of pictures shown, and to place such additional safeguards around the machines that sentiment will grow in favor of the businesses rather than against it, which would be done if the owners were forced by the state legislature to do what they now plan to do themselves.

At the command of King George V, and only after he had witnessed an exhibition of the film taken at the coronation festivities of himself and Queen Mary of England, a complete set of the films and a projector was ordered locked up in the Tower that history might record in nature's own colors the complete ceremonial exercises commemorating his coronation.

Motion pictures were taken in Houston last week by a Houston man, who used a Houston-made motion picture camera. The machine was invented and constructed by Harry Redan, advertising agent for the Sunset-Central lines. It is different from any other motion picture camera ever invented and works excellently. The machine was constructed at a cost of $25.

As to Imitators:

"They copied all they could follow,
But they could not copy our mind,
And we left them sweating and stealing
A year and a half behind."

—RUDYARD KIPLING.

During the year the MOTION PICTURE STORY MAGAZINE has been in existence it has had several imitators. Some of these have fallen by the way, in their struggle for existence; others are still struggling on.

One of these, has shown itself an adept at imitating our publication. Their cover, make-up, advertising and general character is a low grade copy of the MOTION PICTURE STORY MAGAZINE. Although such imitation is very flattering to us, it reflects nothing but dishonor on its perpetrators.

The MOTION PICTURE STORY MAGAZINE was the first standard magazine of its kind ever printed, and it has proved so popular that it now has a large international circulation. It is a great success, it is here to stay.

Recently its scope has been broadened to include Independent Stories. Its sale at Licensed Theatres will advertise both Independent and Licensed plays, and its sale at Independent Theatres will advertise both Licensed and Independent plays. One will help the other. The MOTION PICTURE STORY MAGAZINE thus stands for the increase of attendance at all theatres, the awakening of an interest of a new class of people in motion pictures, the uplifting of the whole motion picture business, and it is accomplishing its object.

If you are going to put anything on sale at your theatre you want the best, not a cheap imitation; you want something you know is here to stay. The MOTION PICTURE STORY MAGAZINE is high class, it is here to stay, it will advertise and help fill any theatre selling it.

You can obtain a supply for ten cents per copy, payable in advance, with the privilege of returning unsold copies at the end of each month, and receiving a credit or refund of 10 cents each. This arrangement is a fair one and insures both you and us from loss. The Magazine sells for 15 cents, your profit 5 cents. Slides and advertising matter are sent free. Just fill out blank below and mail with remittance.

OPERATORS' AND ELECTRICAL PAGE

Conducted by Esau Shindler

Springfield, Mass., March 18, 1912.

Chat Column,

Dear Sir:—I have been a reader of the News for over a year and I am glad to see that it is improving in its work day by day by furnishing its pages with interesting matter. I also read your article regarding the spot light scheme in last week's issue and tried it, and I can say that it is the most perfect spot light I've ever projected on any screen. Every operator should try this, it is only a few minutes' work and it is worth more than any person can think of. The booth I work in is about 7 x 20 feet large and we have two Edison Model B machines. I like the Edison machine very much, because it runs easy and it is noiseless, and also, I never have a bit of trouble with it. I can also say that I hardly have any trouble with the film I run; in most houses when you go in to see a show you will find the operator having a breakdown, a patch come apart and so forth, but I always look my film over, every time before I project it on the screen, to make sure that every thing is O. K. and this saves me a lot of trouble, and I would like to give the fellows who do not know this a hint about this thing and let them try it and see that it is very useful. I am a member of the Operators' Union, Springfield Local, and I can say that everything is fine out here. There is just one thing I would like to have some brother send in, and that is, I would like to control the footlights on the stage from three places, from the office, booth and stage, and if some brother is able to send in a plan regarding this I would appreciate this very much.

I am going to send a photo of my booth later. Having no more to write, I will close with wishes for prosperity to your page. I remain,

C. D. W.,
Springfield, Mass.

To C. D. W.,
Springfield, Mass.

I thank you very much, Brother Springfield, for letting us hear from you and I would like to have you write us often as we are glad to hear from you. I enclose in this issue a plan which you referred to in your kind letter and hope you can use it. I am glad to see that we have some wide-awake operators like you out in Springfield, Mass. The way you write in regard to looking over your film before you run it through, and I think this is the wisest thing any fellow can do. I will also have to call out and see you some day and have a look at your cracker-jack operating.

* * * *

As I was walking through Bowdoin Square the other night my eyes happened to glance on a large electric sign which read, "Olympic Theatre." I felt kind of tired that eve, after scouting around the city's streets, so I thought I would walk in to see their show and rest myself for a little while. I sat down, watching their pictures for some time and I can say that the work of the operator was excellent. His Honor, Edward T. McDermott, President of Boston Local 182, was at the grind, turning the crank of his projector and watching the screen often. The pictures were the brightest I've ever seen before, as Manager Roth had installed a daylight screen some time ago. Also the pictures were run the right speed, giving the audience a chance to get the story, not as some managers tell the operator to rush the reel through in eight or nine minutes and spoiling the screen. Carver Brothers are the owners of that house and they are making a success with the services of Manager Roth, by giving the people a good, big show for a small sum. They use Independent service.

The Rheostat

Ohm's law tells us that a circuit is a flow of current between the positive and negative poles, and that whether it is, or not over resistance, it must have enough resistance to do the work of value between the connection of the positive and negative poles. Therefore, a circuit without enough resistance would be a short circuit. In the lamp house of our moving picture machine we have a lamp or an arc light which is fed by hand and is called a hand-feed arc. In these hand-feed arcs there is not enough resistance to do the work of the circuit and, therefore, we put in a variable resistance device which is called a rheostat. This rheostat is a resistance box having a number of coils of german silver wire which introduce resistance in the circuit.

figure 1.

Water Rheostats

Many times it happens on a one-night stand that the operator has not enough resistance for his machine, he may have one or more wire rheostats which is not sufficient. Then it is a very useful thing to build a water rheostat. To build a water rheostat get an ordinary oil barrel and fill it with water, also mix it with some soluble salt. Place an iron plate at the bottom, attaching to this plate a heavy insulated wire, also place another iron plate and heavy insulated wire near the top of the barrel. The resistance can be controlled by moving the top plate down, but care should be taken not to have them touch each other, which would make a short circuit.

This plan is practical and very useful many times.

THE STORY OF "THE SEWER"

The Solax Big Feature Melodramatic Release of Wednesday, April 24

When John Stanhope, with beaming smile and warming cordiality, stood in his drawing-room, as was his monthly custom—and distributed clothes and edibles to the ragged and the hungry of his community, he was too happy and preoccupied to take particular note of a gentleman who represented himself as Herbert Moore, an agent of the Charity Organization Society. Moore, with silk hat, Van Dyke beard, and suave manner, walked among the bowed and wretched creatures with apparent interest. Secretly, however, he was taking a mental photograph of the layout of the philanthropist's palatial home.

Leaving Stanhope, graciously instilling others with hope and happiness, Moore returns to the den of his gang, satisfied that he is ready to make a return visit to the philanthropist's house, and get away with a big swag.

The gang, of which Moore is the brains, lives in a dive fitted up with trap doors, ropes, pulleys and such paraphernalia necessary for the success of their "calling." Members of the gang return with some "swag." Butts, the gang leader, takes charge, while his surly tools retire and debauch time with cards and spirits. Alert Butts, however, spends his time more profitably. He has new pupils, two little boys, whom he teaches the methods of the underworld with as painstaking care as the apostles taught their disciples. While engaged in showing unwilling Oliver, the younger of the boys, the way to pick pockets, with the aid of a "belled" dummy, Moore comes in and explains that he has a "job" on hand. He tells Butts that they need a bright boy who could enter the house through the window and then open the front door. Naturally, little Oliver, much against his will, is pressed into service.

Gripping events then succeed each other in rapid succession. The gang embarks. Oliver enters the house. He makes his way with a bull's-eye lantern—here we get a remarkable light effect—a sudden flash, the lights go up, and little Oliver faces the muzzle of a revolver. Mr. Stanhope is surprised to see the youthful criminal. He quizzes him. But little Oliver cries and tells his story. Stanhope is moved by the boy's tale. In taking out his handkerchief to dry his eyes, Oliver drops a silver half-dollar. Mr. Stanhope attempts to return it to Oliver, but the child brushes it away, and tells him to keep it, informing Stanhope that the silver half-dollar is the insignia of the gang, and that it can open in the middle and be used in an emergency as a saw with which the user may cut rope, wire or glass. Stanhope's interest is aroused, and he places the little souvenir in his pocket. Oliver then pleads to be let free, and Stanhope allows him to go, after taking an oath that he will not attempt to steal again.

Weary Oliver leaves Stanhope's house and with reluctance returns to the den, where he joins his brother and the gang. He finds the gang in a surly mood. Their ill success they blame on him. He is cuffed and beaten. The gang lounge about moodily. At last, Moore thinks of another scheme.

Stanhope is lured to their den with an appealing message for assistance. When they get him they try to force him to draw a big check. Stanhope refuses. The gang grows desperate. Burly Butts is riled beyond control. The animal in him predominates. He makes a sign for the ropes which little Oliver knows is Stanhope's death warrant.

Knowing what will happen to his benefactor, Oliver decides to frustrate the plans of his masters. He steals into a corner, and writes a scrawly note, informing Stanhope that he will find a keyhole in the wall of the vault. Oliver wraps the key in the note of instructions, and when the gang lowers Stanhope through a trap door into a vault below the flooring of the den, Oliver, unnoticed, steals up, and drops the note and the key into the victim's pocket. Thus, by the irony of fate, little Oliver, who has been taught how to pick pockets, without detection, puts to good purpose his training, and is the undoing of his very teachers.

When Stanhope finds himself in the narrow vault, he struggles hard to free himself from the bonds which almost cut to the bones of his body. At last he frees himself sufficiently to get the silver half-dollar, which he now puts to such good use. He works patiently for hours, sawing at the rope. Fiber by fiber, the rope gives way to the pressure of the sharp metal. With a last supreme effort—snap—and Stanhope breaks his bonds, and he is free—to die struggling blindly against four stone walls! A greenish light streams in from the cracks on the top of the vault. He feels around. He tries to straighten himself and then finds the heavy key and the note in his coat pocket.

He is scarcely able to read the instructions. He strains his eyes until they stand out from their sockets. The greenish light gives him the appearance of a man risen from the dead. "God," says he, "if I can only read this." Gradually his dulled mind absorbs the portent of the note. He desperately feels for the secret keyhole. His search is not in vain. Presently, he swings back the granite door, and he is confronted with a vista of the city's filth and slime. He crawls through the outlet, and makes his way through the sewer channels. The stench from stagnant sewerage pools, cesspool waste, mud and dirt nearly suffocates him. But, on and on he struggles, up to his knees through this liquid filth. Even an attack by a horde of sewer rats does not swerve him from his path. He fights the rodents off, and they scamper. At last, weary and exhausted, he finds his way to the sewerage main, and a ladder leading to a manhole giving entrance to the street.

Bespattered with mud and filth, dishevelled and bedraggled, he rushes through the streets and to the police station. The gang is soon surprised by big Colt six-shooters, and little Oliver and his brother find a home in Mr. Stanhope's happy household.

MANUFACTURERS' NOTES

"The Cub Reporter's Big Scoop" promises to be one of the most popular of the Nestor releases. It is full of action and the settings the prettiest that the mind could conceive. The clever way in which the good-looking energetic young cub gets the desired information about a big sugar deal, from the irascible father of the girl with whom he has fallen in love, are very amusing. The story is teeming with funny situations brought about by the young reporter's frantic efforts to interview the old gentleman. Release date, Saturday, April 6th.

* * * *

"The Divorce Cure," a Champion release for Wednesday, April 3d, is what the name implies—domestic and good. It is a film beautifully put on with the pure, sweet atmosphere that childlife brings into the barren home. The theme itself is most peculiar, and is treated in a way that deserves the very highest commendation, not only of the critic, but of the moralist as well.

* * * *

Asta Neilson, who has been described as a combination of Sarah Bernhardt and Mrs. Patrick Campbell, has followed the former's lead and has immortalized her talent by appearing before the moving picture camera. This great actress has a peculiar type of beauty. It has been said of her that when in repose she purrs, but when aroused she has all the apparent attributes of the tigress, sweeping up and down the gamut of feminine emotions with the practised ease of a great but natural artist.

Two thousand feet of film in which Asta Neilson appears will be released by the Imp Company on Thursday, April 18th. They are also issuing special literature and posters for this picture.

Learning that another Independent producer had made preparations to film "Carmen," the Thanhouser Company state they will not put out this subject as previously announced.

* * * *

Mr. S. S. Hutchinson, President of the American Film Mfg. Company, has just returned from Florida after having arranged for a series of beautiful scenic settings among the Southern States. These pictures will be of an educational and exceptionally interesting character, and the inspiration for the step taken toward securing them was found in the splendid success of the two recent American scenics, "Santa Catalina, Magic Isle of the Pacific" and "A Mid-winter Trip to Los Angeles."

* * * *

"The Dove and the Serpent," a Mexican release of Imp, shown this week at the Sales Co., is specially good. For clean-cut, well-acted scenes, atmosphere and photography it stands at the head of the class.

* * * *

"Love Is Blind," of Reliance, is a great conquest for Miss Robinson, of the Reliance stock. Her work in this film is particularly fine, and the interpretation of the part allotted her of the landlady's daughter, who poses for the young artist lodger, and afterward marries him, is very sweet, indeed.

* * * *

Of "The Margrave's Daughter," of Gaumont, too much could not be said in praise of this wonderful production. It is a marvel in scenic effects and general staging. Such beautiful productions as this are the pillars which are rapidly elevating the motion picture to its proper place as a work of art.

If you want a good laugh see "Aunt Aurora" and "Calino as Mason," of Gaumont.

It has been rumored that Joe "Brandt" Brandenburg, formerly of the New York office of The Billboard and advertising manager of the Dramatic Mirror, would join the Imp Films Co.

Mr. Brandt stated that his only reason for divorcing himself from the publication end of the film industry was because of the wide scope of operations afforded in the manufacturing center.

Taking with him a knowledge of the theatrical and amusement situation and record for the papers mentioned above, he may prove to be a valuable asset to the Imp Co.

Mr. Brandt will become part of the executive staff at the Imp factory on April 8th.

* * * *

Mr. David Horsley, president of the Nestor Film Co., is again returning East from the Nestor studios, at Hollywood, Cal., accompanied by Mrs. Horsley, Stanley, the young hopeful, and Captain Davy—he should be "in our busy midst" by the time this issue is spread abroad. It is possible that his stay this time may be of sufficient duration to enable him to meet and renew acquaintance with many old friends whom he has not seen since the advent of the Hollywood studios.

* * * *

Charlie Simone was the big representative of the Nestor Film Co. at the recent convention of the Ohio Exhibitors' League, at Dayton, Ohio, where, as is always the case with Charlie, he made his presence felt. A flying trip to Chicago on important Nestor business and return home completed another busy week in the busy life of the Busy Bee of Bayonne and Boostville.

* * * *

We are preparing to again offer our congratulations to Nestor on their picture entitled "Her Indian Hero," which is to be released April 17th. An advance copy has been shown, and those who were fortunate enough to witness the first projection are unanimous in acclaiming it a strong and beautiful production, and one which will add another star to the constellation of Nestor releases, which have placed the pioneer Independent moving-picture maker in the front rank of the entire industry.

* * * *

We notice a great improvement in the posters that are being turned out by the Sales Company; this is a step in the right direction, the whole atmosphere of a moving picture theatre is enhanced by the attractive, artistic posters such as are being turned out by the Sales Company's manufacturers.

Of course, the price has been raised, but this would seem to us such a welcome innovation that no one could complain of the increase in price as all concerned are bound to get it back a hundredfold in increased business.

The Bradhurst Field Club four-mile run is included in the Imp release of April 8. This picture will present the best views and the most interesting scenes of the meet recently held in New York City, in which 300 competitors took part, and which include many of the athletes who will go to Stockholm next July, among whom are Martin Sheridan, Johnny Hayes, Kramer, and others of equal note.

A CARICATURE OF A FACE
Champion Release, April 8, 1912

Mr. George Fattie proposes to, and is accepted by his secretary, but he makes one condition of her acceptance, and that is there should be no mother-in-law in his house. This is a heart blow to the girl, but her mother tells her to never fear, for she'll concoct a plan whereby he'll receive her with open arms. Gladly and with joy, after the honeymoon of the Fatties, the mother and daughter get together on a plot. An artist's studio is visited and an order given to that gentleman for a dozen caricatures of the lady. The artist fulfills the order, and the result is a dozen highly amusing and ridiculous caricatures.

In a weak moment, Mr. Fattie consents to permit the portrait of his wife's mother to be admitted to his home, then suddenly he beholds from point of vantage, a face looking down on him—and such a face. A face awful enough to cause cold chills to creep up and down one's spinal marrow. He shied eggs at it and punched it and kicked it, but it showed up like Banquo's ghost, and would not be downed. Then one day he meets the original and the original was nothing like "that face," so he did not recognize her.

Later on, the original insisted on coming into his home. This he didn't want, because he had met her as a sweet thing, and didn't want his wife to get onto his flirtatious conduct. But the sweet thing insisted, and he had to make the best of it—and introduced the sweet thing as his sister. Then the wife slipped forward and said, "This is my mother," and then Mr. Fattie collapsed. His mother-in-law had invaded the domicile, but in such a way as to take all the wind out of his sails.

THE BLUE MOUNTAIN BUFFALOES

The buffalo herd taken on the Blue Mountain Forest Reservation is one of the most interesting pictures of animal life ever presented, inasmuch as we are given a glimpse of the last sad remnants of what was once the pride of this continent, the mighty monarchs of the plains. The herd has been photographed close up in their New Hampshire winter quarters, that we may study with sad interest the noble creatures.

SALVATION SUE
Champion Release, April 10

Jimmy Morgan is the scion of a wealthy father, but Bohemianism gets holds of him and he usually spends his monthly allowance to buy drinks for "the boys." One day, Mr. Morgan determines to end this state of affairs, and he tersely tells Jimmy to "get out and stay out" until he can sober up and be a credit to himself. Jimmy doesn't take this very seriously, so he immediately repairs to his favorite barroom, where he has a fine old time with the boys.

Sue Brown, a Salvation Army lassie, is collecting pennies when one of the half-drunken rowdies insults her. Jimmy knocks the fellow down and escorts Sue to the door, whereupon she thanks her "big brother" and disappears. Jimmy sinks lower and lower until within a month he is nothing but a besotted bum. One day he is helped by Mr. Dorner, an aristocratic old philanthropist. Later, Sue sees an old lady run down by an auto and assists her. The lady insists on Sue accompanying her home and nursing her. She is Mrs. Dorner, the wife of the old gentleman who has assisted Jimmy.

Mr. and Mrs. Dorner and Sue become great friends. While Sue and Mr. Dorner are going their charitable rounds, they visit a very tough dive whereat Jimmy hangs out. Jimmy is asleep at a table and many toughs are idling about. In the brief moment that Sue is absent they set upon and rob Mr. Dorner. Jimmy awakens and tries to protect Mr. Dorner, but is beaten into insensibility.

Mr. Dorner and Sue then take Jimmy to the Dorner home, where he is given medical attention and brought around. Sue learns Jimmy's story and out of heartfelt sympathy for him, she goes to his father and pleads for Jimmy's forgiveness. At first Mr. Morgan is obdurate, but finally consents. All ends happily and congratulations are in order when Mrs. Dorner notices that Jimmy and Sue are oblivious of their presence. The old couple tiptoe out of the room and peek in, to find the boy and girl in each other's arms.

A LOVE OF LONG AGO
Thanhouser Release, April 9

In one of the rural sections of Spain they tell a story, handed down from generation to generation, of the brave soldier, Pedro, and the sacrifice he made for his lady fair. Graves may be leveled by time, and monuments moulder and resolve into dust, but Pedro's fame is not so perishable, for the story of his exploit can never be forgotten.

He was only a humble soldier, stationed at a fort, and he loved a maiden who lived in a village nearby. The girl liked him, flirted with him, and perhaps some day might have married him, had not the "other man" appeared.

The other was a stranger, who suddenly appeared in the village, and secured lodgings with the girl's mother. He quickly won the maiden's love and they were planning to get married, when he was arrested. It happened that Pedro was the one who took him into custody, and he then learned for the first time that the girl's heart belonged to the other man.

At the fort the stranger was questioned, the belief being that he was a spy, but as no documents were found in his possession, the commander of the garrison simply ordered him detained, and did not lock him in a cell, never dreaming that he could escape, when every exit was closely guarded.

The stranger's case was desperate, however, for he really was what he was suspected of being, a spy. The girl determined to rescue him, and after informing him of her plan, shot an arrow over the ramparts at night. A light cord was attached to the arrow, and to this in turn was tied a heavy rope, by means of which the prisoner could escape.

The plan worked successfully, until the stranger was just starting on his perilous journey. Then Pedro discovered what was happening, and with a cry of alarm ran forward with drawn sword. He raised his blade to cut the rope, but glancing down saw the girl he loved, her arms raised appealingly to him. He realized that his rival's life was in his hands, and started to strike. Then like a flash he saw that upon him depended the girl's happiness, and he could not. On the contrary, he held back the other soldiers who would have killed the stranger, was denounced as a traitor and, finally, fighting to the last gasp, fell, supposedly dead, into the sea.

Years later, in a religious retreat, an aged monk, loved and venerated by all who knew him died. Then the story, long a secret, was told to the world. Pedro was not killed, but narrowly escaped. He was found unconscious, washed upon the beach, by a monk, who nursed him back to health and strength. Later he joined the order, and became one of its devout members.

"And brother Pedro was not unhappy," said the monk who told the story. "Once on a pilgrimage, he saw the woman he loved. She was happy with the husband of her choice, and their child. He found, by cautious inquiry, that they loved and revered his memory, and that the first prayer their child was taught was a petition for 'brave Pedro, who died for papa and mama.' No, he never revealed himself to them, and he never regretted what he had done for them."

Pedro is buried in the simple graveyard of the monks. You cannot find his resting place, but his name is not forgotten, and never will he, by those who know the story of his sacrifice and devotion.

AN EASY MARK

Thanhouser Release, April 12

She was rich and a good business woman, but she didn't look it. Her home in the country was comfortably furnished, and she lived there for choice, although property in the city was in her name. One building she owned was a city mansion, and the necessity of collecting the rent induced her to take a trip to the metropolis.

Crossing a crowded thoroughfare, she became confused, but was rescued by a polite young man, who, finding her rather upset by her experience, volunteered to escort her to her lawyer's office. There he saw a large sum of money paid over to her, and at once grew to like her the more.

The fact was that the young man was a crook and saw a chance to make some easy money. The woman, who had taken a fancy to him, decided to be his "fairy godmother," intending to test him out, and if he proved worthy to put him in the way of making his fortune. She was feeling most benevolent that day, and could see a popular story book ending to what promised to be a very ordinary adventure. So she listened while he told her of an excellent and cheap boarding house, went to the place with him, and was well pleased with her reception there.

The dishonest young man devoted much time to planning a way to relieve "the Easy Mark" of her wealth. Some were dangerous, others he regarded as "too coarse." Then Dame Fortune threw a chance in his way and he accepted it gratefully.

He found the keys of a stylish mansion and soon proved to his satisfaction that the owner had gone abroad, and that the place was untenanted. So he went to the woman from the country and offered her a bargain in real estate and, strangely enough, the price was within her means.

It was so easy to swindle the rural visitor that, as he told his pal, the boarding house keeper, it was "like taking water from the ocean." He gave her a deed, accepted her money, and expected to be happy while it lasted.

There was one little flaw in his yarn, one fact he had overlooked, and it aroused the suspicion of the "easy mark." In the very moment of victory he met defeat, and went to prison, angry at himself, and grieving because dishonesty had cost him the best chance he had ever had to make a fortune.

The woman, who had planned to be a benefactress, went back to the country disillusioned and vowing that she would never try to be a fairy godmother again, for it was only by chance that she had escaped a heavy financial loss.

THE HEART OF A TRAMP

Nestor Release, April 1

NESTOR

Henry Fortman's automobile comes to a sudden stop and it's a long way home. Henry investigates and attempts to get it started, but in vain. Fortunately, there is a young tramp in the vicinity. He had been a chauffeur prior to his entering the roaming profession. The tramp, strange to say, goes to work with a vim, and the car is soon able to go on its journey. Fortman decides to acquire a chauffeur and persuades the youthful knight of the road to take the position.

"Dick," as the ex-tramp chooses to be called, looks mighty handsome and distingué when thoroughly cleaned up and appareled in decent clothes. Thus transformed, he is presented to Mrs. Fortman, who is kept in ignorance of the chauffeur's past mode of living. She soon becomes infatuated with the dashing young man, and later what seemed to be but a passing fancy changes into love.

Mrs. Fortman's love and tenderness are wasted upon desert air, for "Dick," whose heart is in the right place, remembers his benefactor and gently, but firmly, repulses her caresses. The woman's unwelcome attentions finally come to her husband's notice. While he debates as to whether he should discard her, "Dick" leaves a note behind and returns to the country, the open air and the life of trampdom.

A violent scene takes place between man and wife, who is finally forgiven through a clause in the tramp's note reading thus: "May God bless you and your wife and keep you close together."

TWO MEN AND THE LAW
Nestor Release, April 3

Tim, an outlaw, is entirely unsuspected, even by his best friend, the sheriff. Tim has always worn a disguise and he has shown it to but one person, Josie, the girl he loves and who has promised to marry him as soon as he turns over a new page. Josie lives with her Uncle Ben, owner of a gambling house. Tim writes her to be ready to marry him at once, as he has tackled his last job. It is the robbing of a bank, and the sheriff, who is home indulging in his favorite pastime of cards, is notified and starts out to trace the robber. He divides his men, himself setting out alone, but Tim has gotten a good start and, after taking off his disguise, he rides up to the gambling house, which Ben keeps, and secures a room for the night. As this gambling house is also a hotel, the tired sheriff also arrives and asks for a room and is told that all the rooms are taken, but that he can bunk with Tim. He is quite satisfied and goes to bed. The next morning, however, he awakens first and is astonished to see Tim's disguise lying near his friend's bed. Upon close examination, he is satisfied that Tim has robbed the bank, as the money is in a small satchel with Tim's tools. He takes Tim's gun and commands him to surrender. Tim, taken wholly by surprise, is forced to do so, but pleads with the sheriff not to handcuff him or tell the people of the hotel and he will accompany the sheriff quietly. The sheriff agrees, and the men go down to breakfast, after which, much against Tim's advice, the sheriff enters the gambling room and starts to play. Cards are his one great weakness and when once started he plays on and on. Noon, evening and midnight come and he never stops until not only his own money but that which Tim returned to him from the bank is swept away. Tim finally gets the sheriff to their room and urges him to drink. After the sheriff has fallen asleep and the gambling room is closed for the night, Tim takes the sheriff's gun and his own tools and creeps cautiously downstairs, blows the safe, secures the money that the sheriff lost and which belongs to the bank, and returns to his room. In the hall he meets Josie. Tim tells her what he has done and that he is returning the money to the sheriff. He enters his room and writes a note, which he puts on the table. It reads:

"I drugged the sheriff, blew the safe and stole the money. Tim."

Then still another note, which he puts in the bag containing the money. It reads:

"Return the money to the bank and don't make a fool of yourself again. Tim."

After which he meets Josie again, and together they go away to commence life anew.

THE CUB REPORTER'S BIG SCOOP
Nestor Release, April 6

Thanks to the Star Reporter's absence, Jack Hunter, the "cub," is assigned to interview the big sugar merchant, Henry Ford, at his country home. Full of enthusiasm, Jack starts on his momentous trip. At the depot he finds that a good two-mile walk separates him from the Fords' mansion.

Alice Ford, the sugar magnate's daughter, is on the way to Mabel Smith's house, preparatory to spending the night with her friend, who is alone. On the deserted road, a footpad attempts to relieve Alice of her purse. The cub reporter arrives at the psychological moment and Mr. Highwayman meets his Waterloo. Alice thanks Jack and then continues on her journey. With his mind full of golden thoughts, many of which concern Alice, the "Cub" reaches his destination. A bitter disappointment awaits him. The blustering old man positively detests interviews and has no love for reporters, cub or otherwise. Poor Jack's pleadings and persuasive eloquence are of no avail and he is actually thrown out by the sugar king. Disheartened and defeated, he returns to the depot, but ill-luck still pursues him—the last train is gone. Duty compels him to report to the city editor, and a hunt for a telephone follows. The railroad station being closed, the nearest and only available phone is at Smith's. Thither he goes. The ringing of the bell frightens the girls. Mabel furnishes Alice with the family revolver, and tremblingly they await developments. Jack is determined to phone and, cublike, he reconnoiters. If he cannot enter via the doors, why not tackle the window? He tackles it and the girls hold him up. The telephone is used, but to summon the town constable. By the time the law's representative arrives, Jack and Alice have renewed their acquaintance and are quite friendly, much to Mabel's displeasure. Alice phones her father and "swipes" the interview for the "Cub."

The big scoop earns Jack a salary increase, home, he looks through the window and sees and his able writeup of the sugar deal molifies Mr. Ford, who finally agrees to say: "Bless you, my children."

THE COWARD
American Release, April 11

It seems to be the delight of some people when it is discovered that a man fears anything to torment him and play upon that particular feeling. Jack Walton feared physical punishment and could never be induced to indulge in fisticuffs. His companions were constantly placing chips on his shoulder and because he did not retaliate, he was branded as a coward.

But endurance comes to an end and one day, when tormented to the breaking point by a Mexican, Jack's anger flared forth and, drawing his gun (of which he was not afraid), he fired, killing the Mexican instantly.

And then the very men who had driven him to it formed the posse that was to hunt him down. They hurried to the mountains where Jack had sought refuge and began stalking him. High up in the mountains the hunted man eluded them, until the pangs of hunger drove him to seek some human habitation. Furtively hiding, he dodges from rock to tree, from tree to outbuildings. Approaching the sheriff's food in preparation. He enters and, holding the frightened woman at the point of his gun, compels her to set before him the simple repast she had prepared for her husband.

In the next room her baby, ill and in high fever, is sleeping fitfully. It awakens with a cry and the frantic mother impulsively starts to enter the room to be stayed by the outlaw's gun. Satisfied that it is no trick to throw him off his guard, he allows her to bring the child into the room. Even his unaccustomed eyes tell him that the child is dangerously ill. He volunteers to go for the doctor and hurries from the house.

Around the corner of one of the outbuildings one of the posse is waiting, having trailed him there. As Jack dashes around the corner the man fires, wounding him severely. Jack stumbles on and soon reaches the doctor. Without giving a thought to his own wound, he urges the doctor to hurry to the bedside of the sick child and then hurries to the mountain fortresses. The doctor arrives at the sheriff's home and by hard and efficient work soon has the child resting quietly.

When the sheriff returns from his fruitless search he learns that his child was saved by the arrival of a stranger. Asking his wife to describe the man, she tells him that the stranger left a note for him. He opens it and reads:

"If you still think I'm a coward, come up to Sage Ridge and see."

But the sheriff never found it convenient to follow the coward further.

THE DISTANT RELATIVE

American Release, April 15

Marguerite and Pearl Alcott were sisters and orphans. Bob White and Charley Wells were friends and fellow-cowpunchers and, incidentally, Bob loved Marguerite and Charley had long cast amorous glances at the dainty figure of Pearl.

A day came when Marguerite and Pearl, orphans, were visited by the Distant Relative, a person of much self-importance and assumed authority. She at once began a re-organization of the girls' household, maintaining a self-appointed protectorate over the two girls, much to the disgust of Bob and Charley. Finally the Distant Relative conceived an idea.

The result of this idea was a letter to an unscrupulous but good-looking young man who arrived shortly after and announced himself as a long-lost cousin. Marquerite didn't like his looks but Pearl soon fell victim to his city wiles, to the utter unhappiness of Charley.

The bogus cousin caused corruption among the ranch hands. They threatened a strike and it was only the heroic work of Bob and Charley that prevented a general walkout. But if he did damage to the ranch by distilling trouble among its workers, he threatened twice as much by proposing to the foolish Pearl that they run away and be married. The cousin felt himself quite confident and he and the distant relative soon laid their plans for the poor girl's undoing, hoping by the marriage to gain control of the ranch. The Distant Relative and the bogus cousin discussed it thoroughly, and the bogus cousin promised to divide the estate with his confederate.

But what happened often to confederates happened to them. Bob White, chancing to step around the veranda, overheard. He kept the matter to himself for a few days when he was suddenly electrified to discover Pearl and the bogus cousin getting into the ranch buggy with suitcase and other externals of a journey. He promptly raised the ranch with his cries, horses were mounted and the chase began. It seemed impossible to overtake them. Down hills they came in precipitous haste but the buggy and its occupants kept steadily in advance of them. Suddenly an idea came to Bob. He stopped a passing automobile, climbed in with Marguerite and Charley and the chase was again resumed. At the outskirts of the town they overtook the flying pair. Charley received Pearl into his arms and the bogus cousin, along with the Distant Relative, were hooted out of town.

DRIVEN FROM THE RANCH

Gaumont Release, April 21

Cowboy Joe is certainly a bad-tempered proposition and mighty hard to subdue when on the rampage. This particular afternoon Joe had lost heavily at gambling and took his adverse luck out on several of his comrades. They came to blows, with the result that Joe received a discharge from his employer, who was also the sheriff of that locality. In vain did the cowboy seek other employment, but the meanness of his disposition rendered same impossible. Discouraged and disheartened Joe is forced to spend the night on the plains with his faithful horse as his only friend. Early in the morning it so happens that the sheriff and his posse pass him in search of a notorious horse thief. Inasmuch as they did not see him, Joe took advantage of their absence and in revenge for his dismissal stampeded the sheriff's horses. However, the daughter of the sheriff detects the sound of hoofs, learns the nature of the trouble and gallops to her father with the news. The leader and his posse then start in pursuit of Joe and are just in the act of overtaking him when he leaps from his horse onto a passing train and escapes. His daring climbing and maneuvering aboard the freight cars forms the most exciting and original picture ever produced. Baffled by his miraculous escape, a price of $200 is placed upon his head and each of the cowboys, together with the sheriff himself, vow to find the culprit, dead or alive. They track him to a desolate marsh when they separate to hunt him down. It falls to the lot of the sheriff to come upon him and rather than see him hang, he offers him his pistol so that he may suicide.

JIMMIE PULLS THE TRIGGER

Gaumont Release, April 25

Jimmie is crazy to own a rifle and pesters his uncle to give him one for his birthday. Uncle indulges his little nephew and buys him a regular rifle of his heart's desire, and Jimmie proceeds to try his aim at shooting. His first practice proves quite erratic and both the large parlor mirror and chandelier suffer demolition. Father then takes an intervening hand, and after due reprimand, decides that Jimmie must shoot outdoors only. With this end in view he starts to make several targets to be placed on the garden wall. In the midst of placing glue on the rear of each target, papa is called away, and Jimmie is left to complete the job. Julie comes in to surprise Jimmie, but he resents her disturbance and thoughtlessly pushes her on one of his targets. Later on Jimmie spies this target in the kitchen and, little realizing its location on Julie's anatomy, takes aim and penetrates the hull's-eye. This starts the comedy a rolling and up it keeps with ceaseless furor.

THE SECTION FOREMAN

A story of a faithful railroad employee who is tried and not found wanting.

Edward Eagan is the foreman of a section gang on a steam railroad.

The story opens with him at home at the bedside of his wife, who is dangerously ill. A physician is called and, leaving his wife with the doctor, Eagan goes out and proceeds up the track with his men to their work.

The wife becomes worse and the physician decides to telegraph for the husband. He does so and the message is delivered to Eagan, while his men are engaged in track repairing, by a messenger on a tricycle handcar. Eagan gives his men instructions and rides swiftly in the direction of his home.

While proceeding his machine is derailed. He stops and notices that the rails have spread. The fast express with its load of human freight is about due. Eagan hesitates and his mind is filled with conflicting emotions. His wife is home, ill, dying, perhaps, and every minute means much. On the other hand, he is the keeper of lives. He has a short time in which to act.

Placing the car on the track, he races back and summons his men. They return and work with strength that is almost superhuman, repairing the track just as the fast express rushes past. Eagan has performed his duty but is apprehensive.

Hastily bidding his men return to their work up the track, he again mounts the vehicle and starts for home, using all his strength to propel the car. He arrives, rushes into his humble home, eager and expectant. He has his reward, for the faithful doctor, who has not left the side of the wife, allays his fears and pronounces her out of danger. There is a happy scene as the humble railroad employee takes his loved wife in his arms.

FALSE TO BOTH

Imp Release, April 11

This is a story set in the placer field of California at the present time, and it relates how two young men left the East for the West on the chance of returning with sufficient money to marry the girl they each loved.

Each swain had his sweetheart's photograph but, unknown to the other, the photograph was that of the same girl; she had two strings to her bow. The men for a time are estranged, because each suspects the other of stealing his sweetheart.

But in the end it develops that the girl marries a third party. So in their disappointment the two young miners become great chums.

This picture is chiefly noticeable in that it is a two man play, no woman appearing in the cast. The scenes are laid amongst rough Californian surroundings which gives one a graphic idea of the kind of life that is lived there.

A LEAP FOR LOVE

Imp Release, April 13

Arthur Law and Samuel Kingston are both aspirants for the hand of Marguerite Leonard. Kingston, however, is the favored one until he seems to be a coward in the eyes of his sweetheart.

He proposes to Marguerite during the progress of a dance at her home. She accepts him and the betrothal is overheard by Law, who in a moment of passion quarrels with Kingston and strikes him. The latter, remembering the respect he owes to his hostess, restrains his anger and refuses to retaliate. Cowardice is despised by the pretty Marguerite, and she breaks off the engagement. The rumor of lack of courage reaches his club, and when he arrives there, he is shunned by his fellow members.

Margerie, while on Brooklyn Bridge with young Law, looks down at the river below and in a flippant mood dares Law to leap over, even with the aid of a parachute. Law is piqued by her dare and tells his friends at the club, who make the attempt interesting for him, by putting up a liberal amount of money, that he will not do it. Kingston overhears the conversation and arranges to be on the boat the day the leap is made.

Law has his parachute on the bridge and in a thrilling scene in which he is forced to evade the vigilance of the police he makes the jump successfully. After reaching the water, however, he is seized with a cramp and is within an ace of sinking when Kingston throws off his coat, forgetting the wrong that the drowning man has done him, and leaps to his rescue. They are both pulled up on the boat and when the exhausted man recovers his senses he apologizes to Kingston and thanks him for his bravery. Marguerite then realizes her mistake and knows she cares for him alone.

On the same reel:

MR. SMITH, BARBER

Smith was of a sporting turn of mind but his wife kept him thoroughly under control. Still when a man decides to deceive his better half for the purpose of getting a night off with the boys, he is generally equal to the emergency. So when Smith receives a message and note from the friend whom he was shaving that a good time awaited him at the Cozy Corner Club, he arranged with the said friend to send him, Smith, a hogus telegram calling him out of town.

So Smith's wife dutifully saw hubby off to the depot and loyally returned to take Smith's place in the barber shop, whilst he was absent. A customer came in to be shaved. Mrs. Smith donned her husband's working jacket and before she had completed her task, accidentally placed her hand in the pocket of the jacket and discovered, not the telegram, which called her husband away, but a note signed "Jessie," inviting Smith to take a friend to the Cozy Corner Club that night. Mrs. Smith thereupon resolved to see things through and chooses for her plan that of disguising herself as a man. In this aspect she makes her entrance into the Cozy Corner Club, picks a quarrel with her husband, fights a duel with him and when the hubbub is at its height throws off her disguise and reveals herself. Thus Mrs. Smith cures her husband of his disagreeable habit of "lying in order to make himself a boliday."

A QUESTION OF EVIDENCE
Reliance Release, April 17

A story by J. Russell O'Leary dealing with the elemental man of the hunting camps up in the North woods. The story opens during the idle moments of rough play and two friends, Jackson and Thompson, quarrel and part in bitter hatred. Later the two men meet at Thompson's cabin, unknown to anyone, and become reconciled. Jackson gets his gun and starts off through the woods for game.

"THE DETECTIVE'S DOG"

Thompson, finding his gun disabled, also hits the trail, but leaves his gun behind, carrying only his traps. Coming upon Jackson fishing, he borrows his gun. While passing through some rocky part of the trail he stumbles and the gun goes off, killing him. Late in the afternoon Jackson finds his friend's body and carries it, with his discharged gun, to the camp. There the men refuse to believe his story and openly accuse him of murder. The sheriff is notified just in time to save him from being roughly handled and the father, positive that his son is innocent, offers a reward for the real murderer. Cushman, who is up in the woods with his consumptive wife, is dead broke and on the hour that Thompson was killed heard the shot and found the body but ran away a prey to his cowardly fears. He finds the reward notice and resolves to pose as the murderer to secure the money for his wife. He goes to the father and pleads guilty. They both repair to the Sheriff when word comes to the latter that young Thompson has been taken from the jail and across the lakes to be lynched. The three follow at a mad pace over water and mountain just in time to avert a real murder. The men force the real story from Cushman of his attempted sacrifice and come to the belief that Thompson really died by accident. Going to his sick wife they tell her of her husband's heroism and give her more than the reward as a fitting recompense.

MODERN SLAVES
Rex Release, April 4

Phil Roberts and his wife were slaves. To digress a little, just as Heaven and Hell are not locations, but conditions within us, so slavery and freedom are not conditions, but states of minds. There have been slaves less in bondage than their masters, masters who have been slaves to worse than men, to a vice, or a deformed ambition or a cruel lure. But the most heartbreaking, heart-aching form of servility is social slavery—the silken fetters that are the symbol of the social system that makes its vain victims vie for false supremacy and lie for precarious prestige.

So Phil Roberts and his wife were slaves. Phil was cashier for a large mercantile house that encouraged him to be dishonest by paying him twenty-five dollars a week; and it just happened that Phil didn't need much encouragement.

But just to show you that the world isn't entirely made up of Phils, we introduce Tom Crane, Phil's office associate and residential neighbor, working for the same salary, industrious, thrifty, ambitious, struggling to pay off the mortgage on his little home, working long hours after the others in the office had ceased their toil to earn a little extra money to make more comfortable the lives of the little wife at home and the two kiddies.

Phil Roberts and his wife were slaves; but their ideas were a litle out of focus, so their poor aristocratic thoughts told them that they were free, but that the Cranes were slaves. Mrs. Crane did her own housework, Mrs. Crane wore very simple dresses. Mr. Crane never wore evening clothes, Mr. Crane didn't belong to any clubs. "Yes," Phil said, "poor devils, they're slaves!"

Phil repeatedly invited Tom to his club, and Tom persistently declined; but once he grew tired of refusing Phil's sincere hospitality. He had to hire a dress suit, so the mortgage on the house was postponed. And he was invited by a man whom he met at the club to attend a little reception he was about to give. "And bring the Mrs. along."

It meant a new gown, but Tom felt he had to maintain his respect among his new acquaintances. So again the possession of his little house was a week farther away.

While at the reception, Phil discovered that he needed a little more money than he had. He excused himself and went to the office; and there he found his employer and an accountant going over his books. He had lied, but the figures didn't, and—he realized! Phil was a slave—and slaves are cowards!

So the next morning Tom found Phil's body, with the gun in his hand. And that evening they had a little talk, did Tom and his wife, and they resolved to emancipate themselves from the sinful serfdom that was claiming them, to return to the poverty that was wealth.

THE UNENDING LOVE
Rex Release, April 7

Since the Silent Messenger summoned the first mortal man to the eternal secret of our ultimate destination and destiny, we upon earth have marveled at the mystery and mastery of Death. Beyond the grave lies—what? Where and what is the vale, veiled and vastly distant, to which our last pilgrimage leads and from which no traveler e'er returned? Is it a place as dark as our last narrow house, with always gloom and never a gleam of light, or does death close the door upon the world and the corridors of mortal time and transport us into a kingdom of sunbeams and song? The Rex Company sat down and did a little mental exploration, and dares to suggest the answer.

His love for his invalid wife was strong, strong and tender, tender and tense; but it was a man's love, and there are things more constant. So when he met a little stage girl and she looked into his eyes in that certain way and gave him her hand with that thrilling little tremble—he forgot. He spoke to her, and listened to her, and he followed the light in her eyes to the shores of sin.

That night the suffering little wife, stoic in her sorrow, her soul happy in her answered love, noticed the change and her heart grew heavy with the portent of an unknown and unguessed disaster. A few days later he told her—told her he loved another. A great cry, like a lost wail from desert wastes, rose up; a silent sob was born to mock the false love of man, and the broken heart in the frail frame beat a requiem, and stopped!

A moment after her eyes closed in death, they opened into a great grandeur and glory . . . But her love for the weak man conquered her happiness, and her spirit brooded.

He married the other; and the spirit of the departed one came to them and whispered in the silences, but they neither heard nor heeded. So she returned to the shores of Far-Away, and there it was given to her to master her problem in a manner to earth's children unknown and unknowable.

A few weeks later the husband entered the house to see his wife in the arms of another. He ordered the man to leave, and the weak woman went with him.

Then in the long, lonely hours, the spirit of his first wife would glide into the room and woo him with her wistful whispers; and once he heard the sound, and with a start looked for the voice in the stillness about him, and found only the hunger in his heart. Once, also, obeying an impulse suggested by an inexplicable and invisible force, he took her photograph and pressed it to his lips. And again he heard the call, and God permitted his to respond.

His body fell back in the chair, and his spirit crossed the divide. And there, in the land of to-morrow, he met her. Gently she took him by the hand and sweet was the smile of her triumph. And as he wandered and wandered, she led him—into the light!

A DANGEROUS MODEL

Majestic Release, April 7

In this story the resourcefulness, courage and devotion of a wife are exercised at a moment that saves her husband from ruin, and herself from embarrassment, effecting an unexpected dramatic denouement.

John Gray finds himself "on the wrong side of the market" and in dire need of two thousand dollars, and, by the irony of fate, he and his wife are about to attend a masquerade ball. Mrs. Chesterfield, a rich friend of the Grays, lends Mrs. Gray a diamond necklace to add to the attractiveness of her costume. Overcome by temptation, Gray takes the necklace, and pawns it, being sure that he will need the money only for a day.

Gray's speculations prosper, and when his wife misses the gems, he confesses that he has borrowed them, but assures her that he will redeem them at once. Unfortunately he drops the pawn-ticket, and it is found by Chester Devoe, an artist, who is devoted to Mrs. Gray. The wife goes to the ball, expecting her husband to come, with the necklace, and there she meets Devoe, who, with the pawn-ticket as evidence, threatens exposure, if she does not accept his attentions. When Gray appears, in despair at the loss of the ticket, he is infuriated by Devoe's devotion to his wife, which she dares not resent.

The next day the artist summons her to his studio, a summons she obeys, in hope of recovering the pawn-ticket. Devoe is absent, for the moment, and a hasty search fails to reveal the ticket to the distracted woman. To further her search she hastily takes the place and assumes the costume of a model, which Devoe has been sketching. Devoe enters, the worse for liquor, and resumes his sketching of the supposed model.

Gray, who has learned of his wife's visit, comes to the studio. Devoe denies that Mrs. Gray is there. Gray attacks him, and, in the combat that ensues, is about to be shot by Devoe, when Mrs. Gray, losing her character of a model, wrests the revolver from the artist. After a hasty explanation, Devoe is forced to return the pawn-ticket, and the husband and wife depart, leaving the befuddled artist to his reflections.

A WARRIOR BOLD

Majestic Release, April 9

If Dick had not been so fond of Helen, and she had not been so fond of soldiers, he probably would have escaped an embarrassing, if humorous predicament. But it certainly was trying when he had called and was monopolizing Helen's attention to have Tom and Joe appear, Tom in his militia lieutenant's uniform. Of course Tom received all of Helen's attention, and was not slow to take advantage of the situation. So Dick sadly took his leave, followed by Joe, and went to Tom's room, there to await the conquering hero.

Dick bewailed his fate, to his two friends, and a brilliant idea came to Tom, by which Dick could gain favor with the lady. So Tom suggested that Dick borrow his uniform, present himself to Helen, on the morrow, tell her he had joined the militia, and, after winning her, trust to her love to forgive the deception.

The next evening Dick presents himself at Tom's room, where Tom and Joe await him, arrays himself in the uniform, and starts gaily forth on his quest. Then the wicked Tom writes a note saying that he is called to the armory, and must have the uniform at once and intrusts it to the husky janitor, with instructions to return with the uniform, at all hazards.

Dick duly presents himself to Helen, who is surprised and delighted at his warlike appearance. But as he is regaling her with the deeds of daring he is going to perform, in comes the janitor, with the fatal note. Naturally Dick demurs at shedding his new-found glory, especially as there is nothing else on the premises for him to wear. He begs Helen to leave him with the janitor, for a few minutes. He protests to that worthy, who loses his temper, and proceeds to divest Dick of the uniform and poor Dick is forced to take refuge in an ornamental suit of armor in the room.

From this moment Dick's troubles come thick and fast. Helen returns, is surprised at his absence, while he remains rigid, in the armor. Tom and Joe call to see how their ruse has succeeded. They are apprised of his presence in the armor by receiving a kick and a punch from the supposed ornament. They turn to the unconscious Helen, ask if they may borrow the armor to wear at a masquerade and proceed to carry poor Dick out and roll him ignominiously down stairs, there to wait until called for.

Fortunately for Dick a burglar, or "second story" man appears shortly on his nefarious mission. Dick promptly throws his arms around the burglar, and at the point of his own revolver forces him to exchange his shabby clothes for the armor, telling the burglar that all will be well with him if he follows instructions. Dick returns to Tom's room, secures the uniform and returns clad in it, to Helen's house. He returns the burglar's clothes, instructs him to make a noise, presently, whereupon Dick will appear and engage him in combat, in which Dick is to be the conquerer.

When Dick reappears in the drawing-room, in the uniform, and explains that he had been called away on riot duty, Tom and Joe are dumbfounded, and Helen is greatly pleased. When a noise is heard below, Dick assures the others that he will protect them, dashes down and engages in a furious fight with the burglar. He is the victor, but refuses to take advantage of a conquered foe, gives him money, and allows him to depart. Helen turns adoringly to Dick and Tom and Joe congratulate him heartily, although they do not know how he has tricked them.

MEETING HIS MATCH

Powers Release, April 9

Nelson is peevish in nature and has always been a tyrant in his own office. He discharges stenographer after stenographer for one trifling reason after another, and all in his employ fear him, with the exception of Jimmy, his office boy, who is as fresh as green paint and has a skin like a rhinoceros. Then Mary Blake comes to work for Nelson and, being the sworn enemy of all tyrants, both large and small, she proceeds to give him a practical lesson in the proper way to treat one's help. It is needless to say that she is aided in her endeavors by the ever-ready Jimmy. The result is that Nelson soon loses his job as tyrant and becomes a slave—and Mary's slave at that, and Jimmy does not lose his job, either, although he richly deserves it.

THE WAYS OF MEN

Powers Release, April 13

Harry and Jack are chums, but the inevitable woman comes between them; they have a bitter quarrel over Mary, Jack marries her, and the two men drift apart.

A year later, Jack and Mary have a child born to them and they ought to be happy, but instead they are plunged in misery, owing to the abject poverty to which they have been reduced.

Driven to desperation, Jack, against Mary's wishes, appeals to his former chum for aid for his starving wife and child. Harry, who has become a wealthy man, remembers only the wrong Jack once did him in taking from him the woman he loved, and he drives Jack from his office, empty-handed.

But fate works strange changes and before many years these two men meet again, but under entirely altered circumstances, and Jack is proven in no wise more forgiving or charitable than was Harry.

DURING THE CARNIVALS

Great Northern Release, April 6

Mr. Smith and Margot, the girl in his office, arrange to go to a carnival, but Mrs. Smith breaks into their tete-a-tete with an intimation that she has accepted an invitation to spend the carnival evening—with him, of course—at her aunt's house. This upsets his plans, and Margot decides to go alone to the festival. Later, however, she sends a letter to Smith telling him that if he can get to the carnival he will know her by her costume in representation of Carmen. Mrs. Smith happens to see this letter and reads the contents. Hubby determines to go, and tells his wife that business calls. Wifey implores the aid of an actress friend, who plots to bring the erring husband to his senses. She dresses as Carmen, and at the masked ball meets Mr. Smith. He begs to see her home, and she consents, providing that he goes blindfolded. This he agrees to, and is led to a waiting taxi just as his clerk hurries up and enters the vestibule. Smith is led to his own home, and when he tears the bandage off, it is to come face to face with his own wife. At first he is inclined to return to the ball, but realizing the humor of the situation, he remains at home.

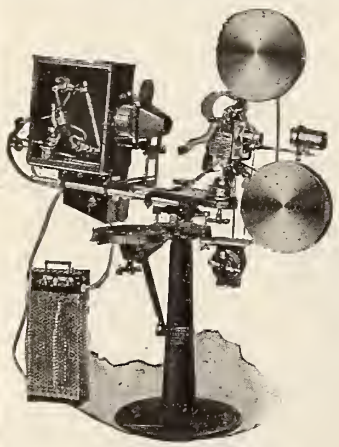
Sound, Substantial Reasons for the Pre-eminent Position of

THE MOTIOGRAPH



No. 1000—A MOTIOGRAPH

What is the reason of that mysterious enthusiasm which makes every one speak in high praise of the MOTIOGRAPH?

What peculiar qualities does it possess, which impel the exhibitor to dismiss the suggestion that othere are "as good?"

We can trace the cause by taking, as an example, one little fact: Every part and every screw is interchangeable with every other part and every other screw.

Accurate dimensions in MOTIOGRAPH parts means elimination of friction and extraordinary ease of operation—besides assuring freedom from worry and "up-keep" expense.

are ready to deliver this new Grafonola with 12 double-disc records (24 selections) subject to three days' free trial, for $59 cash.

Or for the same price at $7 down and $5 a month, no interest, no extras.

This is the Columbia Grafonola "Favorite," the first Grafonola ever offered at its price or anywhere near it. We believe it is the best that can be constructed and sold at its price, or near it. It is the first instrument of the enclosed type offered at anything like its price, capable of all the tonal quality of the $200 instruments.

The 24 selections on the 12 double-disc records include the famous "Rigoletto" Quartette and also the splendid "Lucia" Sextette, for which two selections alone many talking machine owners have had to pay $13. Or your own selection of records will be supplied. (Record album extra, 10-inch, $1.50, 12-inch, $1.75.)

The Columbia Grafonola "Favorite" is a notable combination of high quality and low price. The mechanism is fully cabineted, the reproducer operating beneath the lid, and the sound waves being led through the tone-arm to the tone-chamber where they are greatly amplified and then thrown out through the opening, subject to reduction at your will by the partial or complete closing of the small doors. The cabinet work is of the highest possible craftsmanship, the wood used being either selected grain quarter-sawn oak, or strongly marked genuine mahogany, hand polished. No finer finish is applied to a thousand dollar piano. The turntable is revolved by a powerful triple spring motor, which plays three records at one winding and may be rewound while running. The operation of the motor is absolutely silent, and its speed is regulated on a graduated dial. "Hearing is believing"—and trying is proving. Don't let this day get by before you take action. This is the objective point we have been working toward for four years—and the only mistake you can make is the missing of it! Don't miss it—seize it!

If you own a talking machine of the enclosed type—whatever make—it's full time you knew the Columbia Double-Disc Record guarantee: "We guarantee to every purchaser of Columbia Double-Disc Records that the material used in their composition is of better quality, finer surface and more durable texture than that entering into the manufacture of disc records of any other make, regardless of their cost. We further guarantee that their reproducing qualities are superior to those of any other disc records on the market and that their life is longer than that of any other disc record under any name or any price."

THE SUNDAY SHOW QUESTION AGAIN

WE think all readers of the Moving Picture News will agree with us when we make this statement, that we have always been very impartial to both sides of a burning question, and this week we present our readers with a letter received from an esteemed correspondent on the above question critcising our editorial of March 2. We know our correspondent to be an upright, conscientious churchman, and as such we give him the floor:

THE SUNDAY SHOW QUESTION AGAIN

Your article under the above caption in your issue of March 2, which the writer has just read, is at once a challenge to churchmen and a splendid example of an incomprehensive comprehension of the real viewpoint of the persons whom you have so generously dubbed reformers.

Now the writer, while a churchman, is not of the cloth; while an American for liberty, is not an advocate of license; and while believing in the independent right of choice of the individual as limited by law and established custom, is absolutely opposed to the advocacy, license or violation of the statutory law and the religious customs of the State and nation.

The clear purport and intent of our law and the enactments of the legislatures are at least supposed to express the will of the people and are unequivocally opposed to all public theatrical or similar performances on Sunday; if those who are charged with the administration of the law extended the same wholly in accord with its clear tenor and intent, there would be no public places of amusement open on Sunday.

The preceding paragraph is a very pointed statement of fact which, if challenged, may be very readily verified to such a full extent as to run the doubter out of the debate.

Now from the foregoing premise, when you advocate Sunday opening of moving picture shows you counsel and advise an absolute violation of law. In trying to evade your platform by asserting the individual point of the independent right of choice, you are entirely beside the question and begging the issue; there is and can be no right of choice remaining to the individual when to choose anything is to work a premeditated violation of law. To be sure, anyone may choose to violate or obey the law, but to a good citizen one thing alone remains—obedience. The violation of law, statute law, breeds contempt for it and results in a criminal class, a large portion of which is to-day outside the jails. Crooked police and equally crooked judicial servants of the people have combined, time out of mind, to subvert and circumvent our statute law respecting Sunday.

It is not an entirely new feature of journalism to advocate avoidances of such statutes as seem to restrain personal freedom of action, but it is none the less reprehensible. As well might your paper advocate, for those who dislike the personal restraint, the individual right to practice thievery and highwaymanship as to advocate for others the right to violate our laws against the desecration of the American Sunday. The principles involved in each advocacy are identical, look at it from whatever angle of vision you may. Law is law, and every good citizen will not only obey, but, as a good citizen, will see to it, so far as he may be able, that his neighbor also conforms to it.

Veiled as your article is, clothed in the habiliments of an appeal for the alleged benefit of the poor, critical of the Church and its pulpiteers, pregnant with beautiful and high-sounding demands for an imported population and its right to substitute customs and practices of peoples whose civilization they discard for ours, and granting every premise established in that deceptively, well-constructed article, it is nothing more nor less than a balanced espousal of the cause of lawlessness and that of the wanton sort. So much for the law of the State.

There is a set of commandments emanating from Mt. Sinai upon which the civilization of earth's greatest nations has been built. The fundamentals are sure, but the superstructure, being of man's creation, is deplorably weak and infinitely inferior to what might have been built upon so strong a foundation.

And the church which seeks to be the chief exponent of sacred law not infrequently lays itself open to criticism; but with all its defects it is, up to date, the best advocate before the people of all religious and moral teachings, and it ill behooves the publishers of to-day to attack and seek to overthrow such an institution, either directly or indirectly, by aspersion, intimation or suggestion.

One of the aforesaid commandments limits physical labor to six days in the week, and admonishes peace with devotion to Deity on the seventh. The Jew and the Gentile alike fall under this law. The unbeliever has no part in it, but he is so small a minority as not to warrant serious consideration.

The want of devotion to sacred things so prevalent to-day is the result of too much prosperity, too great a freedom, too much latitude and too small a regard for authority.

The poor seek to follow the rich; the rich are engaged in a ceaseless pursuit of pleasure; and the poor follow suit in a humble way in spare moments. The rich are not happy, and if the poor could exchange possessions with the rich their unhappiness would increase, not diminish.

Man's happiness consists not in the things that he has, but rather in the righteousness of his living.

And when you advocate a violation of sacred law you are against all good morals; hence your effort in pleading the cause of open public shows on Sunday can but solicit open violation of a law, sacred and immutable, which has existed, to the everlasting benefit of man, since the days when it was written on the tablets of stone.

In reply to the above, we have to admit our correspondent is right in his contention regarding the law. One of our esteemed countrymen once made a memorable remark, "The law is a hass." We suppose this remark emanated from the learned jurist when he found that the verdict was very much against him, and while the law in the State of New York may be such that calls for the closing of everything in the nature of labor on the Sunday, how may we follow out this law? If it was put into effect not a wheel would grind, not a boat would move, not a horse would be harnessed to a carriage to take its owner to church, not a train would move from city to city, the telephone would be silent, the telegram and the cablegram would be "non est," the restaurants, the bakeries and such like places would be closed to the hungry inhabitants of this great city of ours, and so on.

This question of Sunday law—we would like to ask our esteemed correspondent where we stand. It is a well-known fact that the law should be obeyed by all abiding citizens and that the powers in authority should see that this law is carried out. We do not ask the question here, but stated in our article of March 2 that, personally, we were in favor of one day's rest for every man, woman and child. We believe they need it. One point in our correspondent's letter says: "The clear purport and intent of our laws and the enactments of the legislatures are at least supposed to express the will of the people, and are unequivocally opposed to all public theatrical or similar performances on Sunday." We are glad our correspondent put the word "supposed" in here. They are supposed to express the will of the people, but we very much question this. If the subject was put up to a referendum of the people of New York City we think the answer would be an overwhelming majority in favor of the people being allowed to use their own individual responsibility as to where they go, or what they do, on the Sunday, providing they do no injury to their fellow men.

This not being a religious paper, we cannot altogther enter into the argument of the Mosaic law as to the seventh day of the week being held sacred, but we do know this, that Sunday, being the first day of the week, is not the Sabbath. Of course we may be met with the argument that one of the Popes of Rome, going contrary to the usual precedent of the Hebrew nation, set aside the Sunday in contradiction to the Sabbath, and people have followed this way ever since. Another point comes into our mind, and that is, why are the churches so empty to-day? There are only two churches or religious bodies that have any weight in this country or anywhere else, as far as that is concerned, viz., the Hebrew and the Roman Catholic—the one, through hereditary sequence, being handed down from father to son, and the other through fear. All others are finding it the hardest problem to fill their churches. The moving picture shows do not find it hard to work at all, but are crowded throughout the day. Perhaps this is begging the question, and these arguments may be irresponsible, and our correspondent may be right in saying we might as well advocate the restraint of the individual right to practice thievery and highwaymanship as to advocate for others the right to violate our laws against the desecration of the American Sunday. There is no connection whatever between the two. Thievery and highwaymanship are absolute wrongs in which the conscience of the individual accuses him immediately of doing wrong. The Sunday show robs no one, except it may be the church collection of a few nickels and dimes; but, seeing the powers-to-be in the city allow full freedom to the saloons and such like ilk, we think the lesser evil of the two, as has been proved over and over again, the moving picture show depletes the saloons and the dance halls and the theatre even as it does the church.

Again, prominent ministers of the Gospel are striving to get the moving picture into their churches to educate the people, and from the collections taken up at the close of the service they are helping to pay their way. What difference is there between taking up a collection in a church for payment of expenses of the moving picture as paying to enter a moving picture show? We, personally, would like to see the law of the land carried out. We are a good citizen enough to do that only which is best and of the greatest benefit for all, and this theory should be in use in our country to the elimination of all that is bad and harmful to the populace. As showing another trend of the subject, we wish to call attention to another letter we have received, from which we quote:

We have received a copy of the Moving Picture News and Mr. Heindel has been much pleased with your write-up covering the Sunday show question. You surely have a field wherein you could do much good in spreading the Rosicrucian Cosmo Conception.

Our columns are open to all who desire to express an opinion on this subject, and, while we do not advocate drastic measures from either one party or another, we would like to see this question settled once for all either by a repeal of the law or by its enforcement.

THE LATE JAMES P. CHALMERS

hibitors we noticed Dr. G. Lamberger, J. Donegan and O. L. Jacobs. J. H. Hallberg, A. G. Whyte, W. C. Smith represented their own firms, as did also H A. Spanuth. Mr. MacIntyre represented the Sales Company. Mr. McCoy represented the detective staff of the Patents Company.

,Among others we saw W. E. Smith, Al Harston, Lem Spencer, of the Spencer's Lyceum, Mr. Webster, of the Webster Press, accompanied by Tom Harper and P. Helvie. J. C. Wood, of the Dramatic Mirror, James Hoff and staff of the Moving Picture World, and Salo Arnsbach, with others, formed the party of the family friends of deceased. The remains were taken to Connecticut on Monday morning for burial in the family plot.

IN MEMORIAM

Mace Greenleaf

Only a few days and Mace Greenleaf passed. He had just accepted a valuable engagement with the Lubin Film Company. Handsome and well-proportioned he was looked upon as a type for modern Grecian Gods, and the directors clamored for his service. He worked in one picture, which will soon be seen all over the country. It was a merry drama and Greenleaf was the hero. Then he took cold and in a few days typhoid pneumonia developed. The good Sister of St. Agnes tried to save the life but the call came in a few hours and he was dead. A factory of 385 people are sorry, but the pictures are being made, though we will never again see the face of Mace Greenleaf. Keep on working though a few hearts bleed the world must be made happy.

"I heard the voice of Jesus cry
This worthy soul has come to me
To rest through all eternity,
To live ye all must die."

AN EXHIBITOR'S WAIL OF WOE

Some of us—most of us—remember a certain Sunday morning, about three years ago, when our exchange man told us there had been a meeting at the Imperial Hotel of Manufacturers and Renters, and how the former had dictated terms to the latter which, according to the exchange man, were impossible. Also that a tax was to be put on the exhibitor who was to pay $2.00 per week for the privilege of using his own machine. We all remember that, and how the exchange man begged us all to stick to him and all would be right in the end—his end, no doubt, he meant. He promised us anything in or out of reason. Good service, free banners and posters, etc., etc. Stick to me and you'll wear diamonds, said he. A great many did stick, but up to the present there don't seem many diamonds floating around. Mr. Exchange Man had very little to offer as an inducement. A few European makers, no American, and just what happened to be in stock when the trust was formed. Still, after a while American makers appeared, in fact so quickly that it made the trust sit up and take notice. Then it was that the screw began to be applied. Posters that had been free were charged for—and as we stood for that without much kicking up the price went; banners were also charged for. Some of us kicked and paid, some went to other exchanges, only to find the same conditions. The service did not improve,—got worse instead—and though the Independents make over 30 reels per week the exchanges have to repeat on a fourth reel. Where do all the reels go to? Talking to an exhibitor the other day, the writer asked him what he thought the next squeeze was going to be: "I'm not worrying," he said; "there won't be any more squeeze for me—I'm going trust, though I've been Independent from the first."

And believe me, but for the man across the street or on the next block, most of us would go trust, too.

DOUBLES OFFICE FORCE

Great Northern Special Feature Film Co. Catering to a Rapidly Increasing Business

Manager Charley Abrams, of the Great Northern Special Feature Film Co., is perhaps the busiest film man in New York. Since launching the concern it has been a record-breaker, although an infant industry in age. It has outgrown the suite of rooms in the Lincoln Building, at 1 Union Square, which were occupied at the outset, and the business is now transacted at 42 East Fourteenth street, the office occupying an entire floor. The office force has been doubled and there are no dull moments. A publicity department has been established for the purpose of exploiting the films and a vigorous advertising campaign has been inaugurated which is bringing results.

Nearly all the territory in the United States has been assigned to live, hustling representatives, who are pushing the big features in their localities, and they are firing in telegrams ordering copies.

Owing to the wide publicity gained and the excellence of the subject, "A Victim of the Mormons" has broken all records wherever it has been exhibited and bids fair to maintain its popularity for months. Exhibitors are besieging the office and territorial rights holders daily for the subject. "The Nihilist's Conspiracy" has established many new marks in the way of attendance all over the country and bids fair to run a close second to "A Victim of the Mormons." "The Call of a Woman," the third subject for distribution, has aroused much interest among exhibitors. It will no doubt prove very popular.

Mr. Abrams announces that other extra reel features will follow, and the product will by no means deteriorate as he has purchased the very cream of the European producers and will astonish all filmdom.

Bridgeport, Conn.—From plans drawn by Architect William Schmidt, work has been started on a moving picture theatre at the corner of East Main and Arctic streets for Samuel Dawe.

EXHIBITORS' MEETING AT DAYTON

By William Lord Wright

The spectre of death stalked into the Sixth Annual Convention of the Ohio Moving Picture Exhibitors' League at Dayton, on the first afternoon of the two-days' meeting, March 26 and 27, and with a wave of his chill hand, cast an atmosphere of sadness over all those present.

That in the midst of life, we are in death, was never more forcibly impressed than on Tuesday afternoon, March 26th, at about 3 o'clock, when Mr. James P. Chalmers, editor of the Moving Picture World, left the stage at Welfare Hall, National Cash Register plant, Dayton. When he left the stage of the Exhibitors' Hall, he also left the stage of life, its joys and its sorrows.

He stepped toward the rear of the hall, opened a pair of folding glass doors, unaccountably left unlocked, and plunged head first down a freight elevator shaft. His skull was crushed and he was rushed unconscious to Miami Valley Hospital.

For a time, no person present was certain of the identity of Mr. Chalmers. He had arrived rather late Tuesday afternoon, had not registered at the Algonquin Hotel, Exhibitors' headquarters, and had gone direct to the Convention Hall. At the hospital a check was found in his clothing for $700 made payable to J. P. Chalmers and $260 in bills were found on his person.

Messrs. Frank Winch, D. W. McKinney, Bert Adler and Harry Raver later identified Mr. Chalmers. Mr. Winch was at the bedside when the end came. Mr. Chalmers never regained complete consciousness after the accident.

When it became positively known late in the afternoon that it was Mr. Chalmers who had suffered injury, the Moving Picture News' representative visited the hospital but was informed that the unfortunate man had a chance for recovery. At about 5 o'clock Wednesday morning, March 27th, however, his soul crossed the Great Divide. Mr. Frank Winch was near the bedside when the end came. He at once notified New York business associates of the dead man.

"Sunset and evening star, and one clear call for me
And may there be no moaning at the bar
When I put out to sea——"

He died as he had lived, a central figure in the business activities he loved so well, and there was many a tear-dimmed eye amongst the thousands present at the convention when the news was sadly whispered later Wednesday that, "Chalmers had gone over yonder."

A telegram of sympathy received by the Moving Picture News correspondent from Editor Saunders, was read aloud in the lobby of the Hotel Algonquin and then given the officers of the Ohio Exhibitors' League.

Later in the morning President Neff conferred with the News' representative and other press correspondents in Exhibitors' Hall as to the propriety of cancelling the banquet for Wednesday evening. It was determined that if Mr. Chalmers was living he would have wished the program to proceed. However, it lacked the spontaneity and gayety that would have otherwise marked the entertainment. Resolutions of respect were drawn up and adopted by the exhibitors and manufacturers present at the convention.

Wednesday's session of the Ohio Exhibitors' League was held behind closed doors, but it is known that Sunday closing and other matters of importance were freely discussed. National legislation for legal Sunday picture entertainments is an aim to be agitated. Efforts will be made to obtain an amendment to existing laws that will exempt the picture theatre from Sunday closing and put it out of the hands of municipal authorities. Government control of the censorship of films and representation on all boards of censors may also be sought by exhibitors. There is no fight on with manufacturers, although it was freely commented upon that the Independent manufacturers were the enterprising ones at the Dayton convention. Nearly all Independent leaders were present, circulating among the exhibitors, while the Patents powers were somewhat conspicuous by their absence.

President M. A. Neff, of Cincinnati, was everywhere to be seen and he proved his right to leadership of National and Ohio Exhibitors. He impressed the fact upon all that the exhibitors have no battles with any group of film makers but only ask a fair deal from all of them. He asserts that exhibitors should have national censorship, with appointments by Congress or the President, and free from politics.

Toledo was chosen as the next meeting place for the Ohio Exhibitors' League and the meeting will be held July 17th and 18th. The Toledo delegation was very energetic in presenting the advantages of their city.

At the Wednesday morning session of the league, Mayor Tyner, of Portsmouth, who is himself a picture theatre owner, said he could see no real reason why the authorities should close theatres on Sunday, especially those in which harmless and entertaining pictures of real life were depicted.

Others of prominence supported Mayor Tyner's contention. The legislative committee appointed by President Neff Tuesday morning made a report and it was determined to watch closely all proposed legislation that threatens to be inimical to the legitimate interests of the moving picture men.

Rev. Herbert Bigelow, of Cincinnati, President of the Ohio Constitutional Convention, now in session, was unable to attend, but Hon. John J. Lentz, of Columbus, was present at Wednesday evening's banquet and spoke.

President Neff, during an address Wednesday, said that political capital could not be made out of the moving picture industry as, "we are organized not for political purposes, but for the purpose of disseminating knowledge among the industrial and other classes and affording amusement to all."

One of the entertaining incidents of the show given at Industrial Hall Tuesday evening for the exhibitors was an address of Miss Martha Russell, of the Essanay Company, who is appearing at the new Majestic Theatre, at Dayton. She told some secrets regarding the making of films, and she has a most attractive personality.

After the arrival of the Cincinnati delegation, headed by a band, Tuesday morning, a parade was formed and hundreds of exhibitors marched to Welfare Hall, National Cash Register plant. As the parade moved through Dayton's principal streets, moving pictures of the exhibitors were taken by Pathe and Gaumont. The ladies were in the meanwhile afforded automobile rides. Many of the business blocks were gaily decorated with flags. Flags were carried by many exhibitors and the scene was inspiring and attractive.

The first big session, that of Tuesday afternoon, was called to order by President Neff. He invited all vice-presidents of various States to the stage and a round dozen responded. He read telegrams from former Senator Foraker, of Ohio, and Congressman James Cox, of Dayton, expressing regret because of unavoidable absence.

Mayor Phillips, of Dayton, gave the address of welcome, which was ably responded to by President Neff. In accepting Dayton's hospitality President Neff said in part:

"We certainly appreciate this royal welcome. We hope to teach to everyone great educational benefits and bring to all the world conditions that exist in every country."

The General Manager of the National Cash Register Company, an educational concern employing 7,000 people, delivered an address which is significant and worthy of extended notice. He said in part:

"The N. C. R. is interested in moving pictures because of organization. Our success is because of organization. This is a new hall and your convention is the first that has ever entered here. This hall is being dedicated by the moving picture exhibitors.

"We always believed in education by pictures. We first started with the old-time lantern slides. We could not conduct our immense business successfully without the moving picture and we want to have the very latest pictures to show to our people from an educational standpoint.

"In five years from now the entire public will realize that the moving picture people are the most powerful factor in education that we have in this country. We cannot do without the moving picture and we wish you God-speed in it," concluded the N. C. R. General Manager.

It was a worthy address; worthy of a great enterprise.

* * * *

Film Flashes

The Moving Picture News was strictly in evidence. Hundreds of copies appeared as if by magic on hotel news stands and in the hands and pockets of exhibitors. Many expressions of regret were heard because Editor A. H. Saunders could not be present. Mr. Saunders' message to the exhibitors, as written in the Moving Picture News, was read by all and expressions of appreciation were freely heard.

* * * *

The lobby of the Algonquin Hotel was a veritable beehive and such a gathering of those prominent in the moving picture realm has been seldom witnessed. The official family of the American and Ohio Leagues, prominent manufacturers, press representatives, and others were always in evidence and there was a buzz of conversation, exchanging of stories, new acquaintances made, and some politics discussed. The hotel management did everything possible to make the guests feel at home.

* * * *

Daniel Webster McKinney, of the Sales Company, was there with the goods during the convention. The Sales Company is fortunate in having such a representative as McKinney, who worked overtime and who is certainly popular with the exhibitors. More power to you, McKinney!

* * * *

Bert Adler, Secretary of the Thanhouser Company, made a hit with the press boys. Adler talked "Dickens" productions (which is our hobby), and he wore a broad grin all of Tuesday. The reason for this is that he was accompanied by a blushing bride. Mrs. Adler was formerly Miss Ethel Kessell, daughter of Adam Kessell, of New York, and they came on to Dayton for their honeymoon. Mr. Adler will likely become general manager for Mr. Kessell's moving picture interests. He'll make a dandy, all right, all right.

* * * *

Sam Bullock, Mrs. Bullock and Sam Bullock, Jr., were right in the midst of things. Mr. Bullock is general manager of the Erie Amusement Company, of Cleveland. The Erie is turning 'em away and Sam doesn't care who knows it. Their motto is the "Best in Moving Pictures," and Sam lives up to the motto. The convention would not have been complete without the Bullock family, which is universally popular.

* * * *

Mr. R. R. Nehls, manager of the American Film Manufacturing Company, was circulating among his friends and received just congratulations for the big advertising stunt the American recently put over in having their film features printed in many metropolitan newspapers. "They haven't found out how we do it yet," remarked Mr. Nehls with a smile. It's a great stunt, Nehls.

* * * *

Mr. and Mrs. Tom Evans were warmly greeted by manufacturer and exhibitor alike. Mr. Evans is doing some great things for the Powers Picture Play Company and he and "his pal," namely, Mrs. Evans, are universal favorites with all. Mr. Evans was very kind to the News representative and we had the pleasure of printing an interview with him in last week's News. He is a mighty clever gentleman and Mrs. Evans is a vivacious lady.

* * * *

Carl Laemmle, Mark Dintenfass and Tom Evans had their heads together in the Algonquin dining room Tuesday evening. Wonder what is doing of moment to the film world?

* * * *

Ralph Radnor Earle and A. Riche, representing respectively Pathe and Gaumont, were on the scene as camera men and did good work. Earle is a character and we hope to have something more to say about him in a later issue of the News.

* * * *

Mrs. Louisa Schmitz, proprietor of the Fulton Theatre, in Cleveland, was present at all meetings. Mrs. Schmitz is the only woman exhibitor in the State and is a member of the Censorship Board of the National Association. "I am a suffragette," said Mrs. Schmitz, to the News correspondent, with one of her attractive smiles. She is very popular with Cleveland moving picture fans and her theatre is said to be one of the best conducted in the Forest City.

* * * *

Carl Laemmle gave us an exclusive interview at this, the first Exhibitors' League meeting he says he ever attended. He was given a royal welcome and the boys all hope he will do it again. He entered into the fun with a vim and posed for the News correspondent. Laemmle is a jolly, good fellow and deservedly popular with exhibitors. He has some great things up his sleeve—but he placed his confidence in us and we are not going to tell any tales out of school. However, Mr. Laemmle promised to give us first crack at the "big stuff" when it "breaks" and we are going to hold him to that promise.

* * * *

Among those in evidence at the convention other than exhibitors were: George Balsdon, Photo-play Advertising and Specialty Company., Pittsburgh; S. A. Lustig, Columbia Slide Company, Cleveland; M. A. Mendelbaum, Feature Film Company, Cleveland; M. A. Walters, Exclusive Slide Service, Cleveland; Allen Haase, Electricity Magazine Corporation, Chicago; C. G. Thompson, manager Victor Film Service, Cleveland, and many others.

* * * *

Mark Dintenfass, of the Champion Company, was given a cordial reception at Dayton and said he was tickled to death that he had concluded to visit the "Best State in the Union."

* * * *

Charles Simone, of the Nestor Film Company, was on hand and shook hands with many friends.

* * * *

We were glad to meet Frank Winch, king of all press agents, who was putting in some good licks. Mr. Winch was completely unstrung over the sad death of Mr. Chalmers. Mr. Winch was near the bedside when the end came. He did everything in his power to care for the injured man and never gave up hope until the last.

* * * *

One Dayton newspaper blossomed forth with the assertion that "moving picture men would wage war on patent film concerns." This headline was strenuously objected to. President Neff says the exhibitors will wage war on nobody but will try and do their duty and work for the uplift of the picture without fuss or friction. There was nothing in the newspaper story to substantiate the headlines.

* * * *

President Neff was popular, of course. Little Miss Thelma Alexander, 13-year-old daughter of R. E. Alexander, of the Dayton Entertainment Committee, presented him with a beautiful bouquet of flowers from the Dayton Local. Marching at the head of the procession that filed from the depot, President Neff carried the flowers to the Auditorium Theatre, where a business session was held Tuesday morning until luncheon.

* * * *

Dayton is rightfully called the "Gem City" and all guests were delighted with their reception.

* * * *

Herbert Miles, of the Republic Film Company, and his pretty wife were visitors. Mr. Miles said he was attracted by a site in Dayton View and it is possible that the Ohio city may become the home of a modern film manufacturing company.

* * * *

The News representative made two special visits to the new Majestic, recently opened by Montgomery, "The Moving Picture Man." Unhappily the manager was absent on both occasions. We had the pleasure of going through this very modern playhouse which is up-to-date in every particular and a credit to Dayton. The Majestic is doing a big business and had Miss Russell, of the Essanay, as a headliner during the convention.

* * * *

Hon. John J. Lentz, of Columbus, delivered a great speech at Exhibitors' Hall on Wednesday evening. We shall mention it at length in a succeeding issue of the News. Judge Lentz, among other subjects, asserted that moving picture apparatus should be installed in every school in the land and he said that if such a method was adopted that the future child of ten years will be wiser than the present young man or woman of twenty. He warned exhibitors that they should take care to throw nothing but the best pictures upon the screen.

* * * *

President Neff is against vaudeville in connection with the pictures. He said vaudeville attractions should be eliminated wherever practicable as it often detracts from the merits of the picture entertainment.

* * * *

The City of Dayton is to be congratulated upon its manner of entertainment and the News man wishes to thank exhibitors and manufacturers for courtesies extended.

CONVENTION OF THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS OF AMERICA AT DAYTON, OHIO, MARCH 26 and 27, 1912

Address of President M. A. Neff

Brother Exhibitors, Ladies and Gentlemen:—In behalf of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, Ohio State League No. 1, I wish to thank his Honor, Mayor Phillips for the kind expression of friendship and good will. In behalf of the exhibitors and their friends in attendance at this convention I accept the keys that his Honor has so generously presented to us, and assure him, while this key will unlock the doors of Dayton to us and bid us welcome, we are not unmindful of the generous hospitality and personal greetings that we have received since coming to your fair city.

I want to thank you and very citizen of Dayton for their kind consideration and splendid reception. As I view your magnificent buildings, your well-paved streets, your beautiful parks and your natural surroundings that nature hath bequeathed to you, assisted by the scientific hand of genius, and the progress, the rapid growth and hundreds of factories, I congratulate you upon your commercial activity and splendid prosperity.

We wish to thank the good citizens of Dayton who have so generously contributed in assisting Local Number Five in bringing our convention to your city and making it such a grand success. We wish also to advise you that your entertainment of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America in your city is like bread cast upon the water—will be seen many days hence. The pictures that have been taken of Dayton will be shown around the entire world. It is not necessary to tell you what that means. Cinematography, with the rapid growth of its popularity, is educating and amusing the world—especially the great industrial class. Cinematography to-day is practically in its infancy. The great field of education and advancement that will be made in the next two or three years through and by the motion picture is beyond the mind of man to comprehend or foretell.

An educator that can reduce the student's years of study from five to one year and more efficiently equip him for his profession must be acknowledged as marvelous. That is what the motion picture is doing. An educator that can direct the hand of surgery and at the same time assist medical science is most wonderful. An educator that eliminates all that is false and brings to the world only those things which are true shall be recognized as not only the advance agent of education but the greatest benefit known to modern civilization.

Through cinematography the world is daily growing smaller. It is bringing all nations of the earth, in a sense, together. It shows you the ways and environments of the city—also of rural life.

We are in favor of the churches showing Biblical and educational pictures on Sunday, believing that it will result in great good in increasing the attendance and arousing the public to a sense of its religious duty; however, we are opposed to our places of worship being commercialized. We do not believe that the churches should be used to display comedy, drama or vaudeville.

We believe that the great industrial classes should not be denied the right to enjoy the innocent amusement of motion pictures on Sunday. The picture show is rapidly developing into the greatest educator the world has ever known. Although the industrial class may not have an opportunity to attend only one day in the week he will keep abreast of the times, receive educational benefits and at the same time derive pleasure and enjoyment from attending the motion picture exhibits on Sunday.

We believe in political rights and commercial rights, also religious freedom. After six days of labor every person should have the right and privilege to enjoy the recreation and pleasure of the innocent amusement of the motion picture as it is instructive, educational and amusing.

If cinematography is protected and not used for scheming politicians and others for unfair purposes and self-aggrandizement, the good that will be accomplished will advance us hundreds of years, make us more proficient and above all educate us to a higher standard of forebearance and friendship.

Our organization is organized for the purpose of uplifting every branch and every part of the motion picture business, to weed out the undesirable, to bring about conditions that will appeal to every fair-minded man and woman and educate and daily disseminate intelligence to all classes throughout the world.

MANUFACTURERS' NOTES

We learn on good authority that Pathe Frères are building a large factory in Jersey City and will vacate the offices on Twenty-fifth street and take up their quarters in the new building, so that by this arrangement both the studio and the office will be under the direct personal supervision of Mr. J. A. Berst.

* * * *

Mr. David Horsley, of the Nestor Film Company, is again in the East, and is now at his home in Bayonne.

Mr. Horsley's wife and family accompanied him East, where they will remain for a few weeks.

Mr. H. C. Simeral, who has just returned from a trip into Western Canada, taking him as far as Calgary, Alberta, reports very satisfactorily upon the general tone of the Independent business.

Mr. Simeral did splendid business for the Champion Film Company whose interests he represents, and whose productions are so rapidly increasing in quality.

"Winona," an Indian picture with well placed atmosphere, is about to be released by Champion and is bound to make itself felt on the market. The story is good, filled with human interest.

* * * *

Mr. Chas. Simone, of the Nestor Company, has just returned from a business trip to Chicago, after having represented the firm at the Convention of the Exhibitors' League at Dayton, Ohio.

Mr. Simone, who has always been known as an Indefatigable worker, and conscientious almost to a fault, with any concern with which he has had any connection, will no doubt feel much benefited by his trip and the Nestor Company derive also equivalent benefit from the business efforts of its worthy assistant in the person of Mr. Simone.

* * * *

Capitalized at $40,000 and proposing to operate a circuit of ten motion picture shows, the well-known local theatre men H. P. Mollere, Charles Lohmann and Victor Mollere have organized one of the strongest companies in Louisiana, outside of the large cities. The new circuit will include Natchez, Miss.; Laurel, Miss., and Jackson, Miss. Messrs. Lohmann and Mollere maintain show houses at Hattiesburg, McComb and Brookhaven, Miss., besides the one in Hammond.

* * * *

A card with the inscription, "We will go 'round the world together," attached to the big bouquet given President M. A. Neff, of the Ohio and National Exhibitors' Leagues, by Miss Thelma Alexander, was sent the pretty young daughter of Mr. and Mrs. R. E. Alexander to-day by Mr. Neff, in appreciation of her welcome.

The presentation scene was gotten into a motion picture film which will be displayed all over, hence the significance of the card's inscription.

* * * *

A temporary organization to be known as the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association, was effected at a meeting held at 306 Market street this morning. Proprietors of fifteen moving picture theatres in this city were represented. C. J. Hasenauer, was elected temporary secretary and was instructed to notify the proprietors of all moving picture theatres, of which there are about seventy in the city, of a future meeting to further discuss the interests of the organization.

Martin Singer, who was appointed temporary chairman, explained the purpose of the organization. He declared that the meeting had been called to consider the drafting of a city ordinance regulating moving picture shows which would be in conformity with the views of the city authorities and the moving picture men.

"As it is now," said Mr. Singer, "the ordinance is very unsatisfactory. We are under the supervision of the building department, the license department, the bureau of combustibles, the Board of Health, the police and several other city departments. We are willing to work in conjunction with the city authorities in regulating the moving picture theatres."

It was suggested that it might be well to try to secure a yearly license payable twice a year for the moving picture theatres. The proprietors are now obliged to pay every week and payments in advance are not accepted.

CLEARED $100.00 PROFIT OVER REGULAR RECEIPTS ON "SOLAX NIGHT"

Over 900 letters have been received last week by the Solax Company regarding the Billy series of comedies and our powerful series of spectacular melodramas. Exhibitors are featuring our releases on regular "Solax nights." An exhibitor in Easton made $100.00 above his regular daily receipts by featuring a "Solax night" on Wednesday, March 27th. Here is a copy of one of the letters:

STAR THEATRE
Easton, Pa., March 28, 1912.

Dear Sir:

"Solax night" last night was one big success and certainly made the people wake up to the merits of Independent films, especially the Solax.

Your film, "Billy's Grip," was certainly a roar from start to finish, and it certainly scored a hit for "Billy." Mr. Quirk was behind the screen on the stage when it was first run, and he let loose with "I believe that's a good picture." I agreed with him. Right after finish of this film, "Billy" entertained the audience with a few songs and some sound philosophy.

We cleared $100 above our regular daily receipts. The house was jammed to the doors.

Enclosed please find photo of exterior. It is not mounted as I am mailing it right from hands of the photographer. Not much of a front, but ask "Billy" about interior.

Thanking you and your company for your many favors, and wishing Solax best of success, I am,

Yours truly,

H. KROHN.

By Mary Lawton Metcalfe

President of People's Club of Patriotic Education

Gentlemen of the moving picture trade, you will want to read every word of this article, for I never take a pen in hand, or sit at the new Oliver, unless I have some message and news to scatter that count in practical suggestions.

* * * *

The educational development of the moving picture business is now the feature-leader for wise manufacturers! This is no theory, but from my own experience and interviews with some of the most prominent leaders of thought and public works in Greater New York.

* * * *

You have read my articles in the Moving Picture News as to the psychological value of this splendid commercial industry. You have read how the best American citizenship can be inspired from sights projected by the picture-machines. Well, after writing the series of articles for this magazine, I have been devoting my time to working out personally the theories I launched as a teacher, a professional newspaper woman, a clubwoman and an organizer, besides only a hausmutter!

* * * *

I have found the men and women identified with the trade perfectly splendid.

To begin with—well, everybody knows what the editor of this Moving Picture News does to give a good introduction to anybody focused in helping to interest the highest powers in city and nation to recognize and establish Moving Pictures as the greatest lever for progressive education.

Yes, indeed, Mr. Saunders deserves bouquets of spring flowers for his unfailing appreciation and co-operation in our work.

* * * *

Having had such a generous expression of approval of the soirée tendered me by Mr. Hollaman in February at the Eden Musée, I put on my thinking cap to materialize the mental picture of what I knew would be the first entertainment of its kind in the world.

The spark lighted up my courage; one fine day I put on my "opery hat" and went junketing down to Manager Currie, of the Richmond Theatre, Stapleton, Staten Island. It carries a standard stock company of real drama and has scored as fine successes this season as many a Manhattan establishment.

* * * *

"Mr. Currie, I want the theatre any off afternoon, that I can put on educational matinées with moving pictures; I can tell the story to school children, their teachers and parents—indeed, to the public who want to be entertained both with eyes and ears."

* * * *

Well, if you do not know Mr. Currie, I wish you would call at the Richmond some day with brand new ideas. There is your man! No grass grows under his feet when the proposition offers clean amusements for the people.

* * * *

The first educational matinée arranged and directed by a mere woman—only an actress on general principles that all ladies are actresses—was given on Thursday afternoon, February 29, 1912.

In making my bow, gentlemen and ladies of the fraternity, remember I am a New Thought person and therefore not a bit stuck-up. Everybody has a job to do if he listens to the Great Universal Spirit Mind of all Good. This is my job and new light comes every day. We are all growing braver and stronger if we let the Spirit lead.

* * * *

The matinées at the Richmond Theatre, Stapleton, S. I., last from 3:30 o'clock until 5 p.m. The first audience was made up of two hundred parents, teachers, children and librarians. You see on a single block there is the large public school of New York City—No. 14. I must say right here that the principal, Mr. Burdick, has been most co-operative in endorsing the new idea suggested, that the school, the library, the theatre all on the same block, as in this instance, are a powerful composite factor in education for citizenship.

The films selected were "The Tempest"—Shakespeare; "San Catalina Island," "Siege of Troy," "Lake Garda." I gave a ten-minute lecture from the stage on the vital question—"What Shall Our Children Read?"

Then, occupying a stage-box, I talked to the audience, attracting attention to the leading features of each picture and the lesson or idea which the author wished to lead in his work.

Mme. Baer, of Paris, assisted with vocal solos, and was accompanied by Miss Jaros at the piano.

This is the largest theatre in the Borough of Richmond, seating eight hundred, and yet we were able to give an educational matinée for the people and their children at ten cents admission. The films were secured for me through the courtesy of the General Film and Publicity Company, of which Mr. H. A. Spanuth is president. Of course a performance of two hundred at ten cents did not pay the expenses, but whoever sends out a brand new idea and expects to get rich right off the reel the first day?

* * * *

Both the manager, Mr. Currie, and myself were perfectly satisfied that the educational matinée for the people was born in the Richmond Theatre on February 29, 1912. Should it be canned here? It can not.

* * * *

The Second Educational Matinée followed seven days after, on March 7th. Promptly at 3:30 the white curtain put on "Mother Goose" to an audience of 250 children, clubwomen, teachers, ministers and good people.

Without paying in the local papers for advertisements—himmel, one must creep before walking—nicht wahr?—well the pressmen gave me splendid write-ups in The Staten Island World. And here's for another spark—ladies and gentlemen, always make friends with the press, printers, and all that pertains to their papers.

* * * *

The audience were enthusiastic over the live antics of Jack and Jill; sighed and groaned when the rich baby fell out of the tree, where an inexperienced papa and awfully rich young mamma had hung it up out of sight. The "Mother Goose" made a big hit. The young audience of juveniles read off the rhymes from the curtain in a chorus; it was great!

* * * *

But "Mother Goose" was not a bit bigger hit than the "Pied Piper of Hamelin Town," "Little Red Riding Hood," and "Cinderella."

* * * *

Again I sat in the box and told the story that was being acted in pantomime. Short talks while the reels were being changed kept up the interest.

* * * *

Like the small boy with his mouth full-crammed with bread and treacle—the juvenile audience called "More—more—more." There was one more reel, but the theatre was needed for the night performance of that splendid drama, "The Firing Line" now on, so we had to send back the "Prodigal Son," for there was no time left for him after fairy folk had the runs.

* * * *

The value of this article is in its suggestiveness!

I have been told recently that millions of dollars are awaiting to be put into the trade when it is uplifted. Now let me say to such capitalists that families are waiting for moving picture theatres that will guarantee only simple, juvenile picture stories of gilt-edge, conservative record.

Tales of Shakespeare such as "The Tempest" can never grow old and out of commission. "Midsummer Night's Dream" and happy hour stories.

* * * *

Why, then, wait, you who have the money to burn or to invest? Staten Island is too small to keep the educational matinée, I say, as a copyright-canned idea of new thought.

There should be the educational matinée in the heart of every school and library district—not weekly, but daily.

The young ladies in charge of the juvenile reading clubs are enthusiastic over the results already shown from my work at Stapleton, S. I. They say that the children came in and asked for the book about Troy and Helen and Paris. One little girl could remember only the word Naples, but as Miss Horak had attended the matinée as my guest, she had seen the "Tempest" and knew just what book to hand out to the child-reader. Miss Horak is Superintendent of Carnegie Library.

* * * *

It is because the pictures give ideas that they are recognized. "Ideas—yes, indeed, many teachers have told me this week—ideas of wrong living have been distributed from the cheap theatres, but the work that you have begun is the greatest yet brought to our attention of the educational advantages of moving pictures for the public places of amusement."

* * * *

Things look so easy on paper, like the new recipe for angels' food, that can be swallowed whole without a grain of salt. I could not go on whooping up only in writing what a pearl of great price has been found in a commercial industry—until, as I said, I took up the matter at my own expense and find that all prophets are not dead! The only thing now to do is to cruise around in every crowded school section and secure a safe, clean building. Make friends with the principals of the schools, the public librarians, the ministers and those big bugs who set the buzz-saw and the fashions. Women are our best friends as advertisers.

* * * *

The educational matinée in the cities must be in charge of trained educated women, who have originality, and above all tact and a talent for talking right to the hearts of the people.

* * * *

I told the parents that it is absolutely necessary that every community should support a moving picture theatre, where they can be sure children may get only beautiful ideas of life, hope, happiness. What will not be poison to the minds of men and women can be the fatal dose to the growing boy and girl in their teens. It is the confidence of parents, preachers and teachers that can be established in the moving picture matinées to the good.

* * * *

The first educational matinée gave pleasure and experience without money for expenses. The second gave more pleasure and more experience with money to cover expenses, and perhaps the third will pan out profits to pay a railroad fare from Staten Island to Brooklyn.

* * * *

This is only the A, B, C of the possibilities of matinées and soirées for the people and their children, who, after all, you must remember, are the future citizens of our great, free country—the greatest for peace, progress and prosperity.

SIDE LIGHTS ON THE CINEMATOGRAPH

More About the English Censorship

By Leonard Donaldson

As I have previously stated, the proposed censorship has met with a deal of discussion and no small opposition in London. The daily press sometimes contend that the adoption of yet another State official would, in this instance, be a very admirable thing, and another time they appear to regard the entire matter as having very little importance, and that the deputation of gentlemen who waited upon the Home Secretary was quite unnecessary, as the selection of films could quite well be done by specially appointed members of the trade. This fickleness of opinion might be accounted for by the measure of advertising support the journals in question are obtaining from the film business—it most certainly is not a conscientious opinion.

It is strange that at this very moment when all the free intellectual forces of the nation are engaged in trying to get rid of that absurd anachronism, the Censor of Stage Play, this proposal regarding the State censorship of films should be made.

Personally I hold, and I venture to assert, that my view is very common, that the institution of such an official is quite unnecessary, because the police and the London County Council possess full power to prosecute the exhibitors of any films that are indecent or in any way undesirable. We are not in need of a meddlesome Home Office clerk, whose knowledge of the business would probably be as limited as his judgment.

The present state of affairs only emphasizes the fact that a strong and representative cinematograph organization is wanted in England. It is natural that the Home Secretary should desire to consult the industry on matters which may from time to time arise affecting it. The right of proper persons under such circumstances to consult would be the committee of the central organization and not a number of anonymous individuals who claim to represent the cinematograph trade. There are legions of such persons in this country—the brassy, presumptuous, self-glorified "handle turners"; individuals, too, who have no just claim as members of the industry abound everywhere.

If the deputation expressed the views attributed to it in the press—that a Film Censor would be advantageous, exercising, as he would, a wise judgment—the deputation was expressing merely the individual views of the members thereof and not of the cinematograph, as will be proved by a reference to my previous article on the censorship, where the opinions of leading members of the industry were quoted.

Producers and exhibitors alike are opposed absolutely to the establishment of a Censor, and they believe that the institution of such an official would be an act, not of wisdom, but of folly. At the present juncture it would undoubtedly be so. Change and uncertainty are the main features of the English film trade at this moment. Trusts are even now in the process of formation—the industry is passing through an extremely trying stage. Any advance is made falteringly, and the smaller members of the trade see troublous times ahead.

When the photo-play holds the same position as the "legitimate" drama and the music hall; when the picture theatre is equal financially to either of these former classes of amusement, then perhaps organizations may be formed which will render totally superfluous the interference of a State functionary.

Philadelphia, Pa.—Plans are being prepared for a moving picture and vaudeville theatre to be erected for J. Janke and T. J. Mooney, at Hunting Park and Germantown avenues, with a seating capacity of 1,500.

NOTES OF THE WEEK

AT each review of Independent pictures we find a solid truth being driven home that if the Independent manufacturer continues to improve the quality of his goods in the future as he has done in the past the Independent product will not only equal, but excel the best efforts put forth by competitors.

A committee from the Federation of Churches and local moving picture theatre managers met a short time ago at the Colonial Theatre, on Summit street, Toledo, to discuss plans for the betterment of moving picture shows.

Wm. F. Bettis, speaking for the managers, demonstrated to the clergymen and others present in a very convincing manner that it was far more profitable for a theatre manager to produce good shows than bad, for the latter cannot live for any length of time in any place. He spoke of the association in Toledo, telling of its aims and purposes. At the conclusion of his remarks, the committee seemed to feel that the picture theatres were not such a menace as they at first thought.

The meeting Tuesday morning was suggested by the managers some time ago and was unanimously accepted at the federation meeting Tuesday night, March 12th. Some time previous to that the ministers throughout the city were asked to co-operate with the moving picture men in an effort to get better pictures for the theatres here.

That Roentgen or "X-rays" are being used successfully by the German medical profession for the diagnosing of disease of the internal organs is the statement made by Professor Kuttner of this city. Dr. Kuttner declared that by means of the "Roentgen kinematograph" a splendid picture of the movement of the stomach has been obtained. It was now possible, said the professor, to look into abdomen and chest and see the organs at work.

The Kinemacolor Company has taken a three-years' lease of the Garden Theatre and will exhibit colored motion pictures there.

William Quaid, formerly of this city, who has been managing the Arlington (moving picture) Theatre, at Poughkeepsie, has accepted a position with a vaudeville booking agency with headquarters in New York. He was a pioneer in the moving picture business in Poughkeepsie.

The greatest operatic stage in the world compared with the cinematographic studio is insignificant. A large company of actors and actresses is employed. Some painters work day and night, and the camera is a merciless detective of poor work. One wardrobe establishment keeps 7,000 costumes packed ready for instantaneous use. When the play is of an interior more than 80,000 candle-power is cast upon the stage. The average of 150,000 films is placed on the British market weekly.

Says the St. Louis Star:

Very properly Express Messenger Trousdale is being rewarded in various ways for his courage and devotion to duty in fighting desperate train robbers, and also very properly he has declined offers to enact the scene for a moving picture film, several firms having made him propositions to that end. No such scene could pass the National Board of Censors, though that fact would not keep it from being shown.

The mere suggestion to enact the robbery and death scene for picture shows is enough to give warning that as yet our control of picture shows has not progressed to the point where such films as that can be prevented from being displayed, save in such cities as have proper ordinances and enforce them. It is one thing to honor a man who has, at the risk of his life, killed men who were committing crime, but it is entirely a different thing to use the criminal act to educate children to commit crime or to look upon killing as a desirable thing to do.

If Messenger Trousdale declined these offers because of modesty, he is to be commended. If he did it also because he disapproves the use of such pictures on principle, he is still more to be commended. At any rate, we shall not have them, unless some firm of film makers fakes them, and in that case they should be stopped wherever attempted to be shown.

* * * *

Iowa Federation of Women's Clubs has started a movement to induce managers of motion picture shows to exhibit hygienic subjects throughout the State, and the Women's Municipal League of Tecumseh, Neb., has arranged with a local theatre manager for the exhibition of films illustrating the civic needs and work of the city.

The Lyceum Company, of New Jersey, are about to erect one of the finest fireproof moving picture theatres in the United States, in Bayonne, N.J.

This theatre will cover a plot of 100 ft. by 100 ft. and will be of novel construction, seating about 1,400 people. Ground will be broken in about two weeks, and the theatre is expected to open not later than July 1st, 1912.

During the New York run of Florenz Zeigfeld's new show, "The Winsome Widow," which is to be produced in the near future as the first attraction at the Moulin Rouge, formerly the New York Theatre, there will be installed in the concert hall a moving picture device which will do away with the screen, allowing the shadow figures to move about the stage as though they were real persons. Will wonders ever cease?

The Inventors' Guild claims that frequently a perfectly worthless patent is used to cloak or hide an essential trade monopoly. The petition says the constitution authorizes Congress "to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing to inventors for limited periods the exclusive right to their discoveries," but that modern corporations have devised a system of protective patents for the specific purpose of preventing a further advance in the field in which they operate.

OPERATORS' PAGE

Edited by Esau Shindler

Bryan, Ohio, March 23, 1912.

Editor of Operators' Page,

Dear Sir:—I am a subscriber of the News and I am also a reader of your page. I have read your kind advices to the other fellow-operators and I would like to get a little advice from you. I have been operating out here for the last two years, and am earning pretty fair wages, but only one thing that bothers me is, that I am sick of this town and would like to skip over to some other State and get a job as an operator. Therefore, I would like to refer to you for some information regarding your State and would like to know whether your State requires operators to have a Massachusetts license or not, and do you have to be a citizen and also would like to know if their examination is hard. If you could please let me have this information I would thank you very much for your trouble. Hoping to hear from you soon, I remain,

Yours very truly,

I. N. W.

To I. N. W.,

Dear Friend:—In reply to your statement regarding our State I can say that I would advise you to stay where you are. Keep up courage and you will be all right.

In Massachusetts you must take an examination at the State House before you can receive a license to run a machine. The examination fee is $3.00 and must be paid at the time of filing the application and the applicant must be a resident of the State. Our examination is surely the hardest in this country, and it takes from three to four hours for a fellow to get by it. You also must be a good electrician, because the examination covers the whole electric lighting system, especially the three-wire system. You would have to connect up an operating circuit to a machine, beginning from a large switchboard having all its connections concealed behind the board. There are also several dummy fuses and it would be necessary to test each fuse. Then later, if you are lucky enough to get a light at your carbons, you must project a clear, white light on the screen, before they give you a chance to run the show. After your show is run to their taste, they then let you have a license for your good work. Also the State Police keep applicants waiting two or three weeks after application is filed, and in case of applicant failing to pass, they allow you an appeal, and if applicant fails on the appeal, then he must wait ninety days before he can file another application, which would have to be accompanied with another fee of $3.00. Therefore, dear brother, take my advice and stay where you are unless you have a lot of time and money to spend, and even this would only meet disappointment. Remember the old saying, "A rolling stone gathers no moss."

Wishing you luck, I remain,

Editor of Operators' Page.

Louisville, Kentucky, March 20, 1912.

Editor of Operators' Page,

Dear Sir:—I have been a reader of the News for quite a while and I see that it is improving in its work every week. Can also note that you have started a very good thing for operators and that is the operators' page. I am an operator of a machine out here, but I never tried to connect one up and I would like to have you please give me some information in the wiring work of a machine from a main switch. Operating is pretty good out here and there are not very many houses in town. Hoping to hear from you soon and wishing your page success, I remain,

Yours very respectfully,

J. H. M.

To J. H. M.,

Dear Friend:—I received your kind letter and in reply can say, that I am enclosing a few plans in this issue regarding the wiring of a picture machine. One thing I am surprised to see, that we have operators in some States that do not know how to wire up a machine yet. Well, brother, do not blush for me saying this, because if you don't know how to do this now, you will find out and be able to do it later. It is too bad that some States allow such operators, but I suppose the day will come sometime when they will open their eyes and see their work. Hoping you will be able to understand my plans and that you will be able to learn the wiring of a machine.

Wishing you luck, I remain,

Editor of Operators' Page.

A very clever piece of work was performed in Boston a few weeks ago, when a fire broke out in the Imperial Theatre, which is situated on the corner of East Broadway and Emerson street, South Boston. The house was filled with about 200 women and children, when a blaze started in one of the dressing rooms adjoining the theatre. The cry of fire was soon sounded through the building and within a few minutes the audience was in an uproar. By the quick-witted and cool-headed services of Special Officer Dorsey and the attaches of the theatre, the crowd was calmed and all was quieted down. The theatre is situated one flight upstairs and the children rushed for the exits and the attaches were at their work, warning the children not to rush or push while going down stairs, and everything worked all right. The damage was slight, excepting what little was done to the clothes in the dressing rooms and Drummer Stillinge's traps and the piano received a bath. But the best part was the work of the attaches of the theatre who deserve much credit.

NESTOR RELEASES

Splendid stuff is forthcoming from Nestor this week. "The Torn Letter," April 8th, is a fine piece of work which keeps one in breathless suspense from beginning to end. It is the old story of something being put down on paper, found and read by a jealous husband and misconstrued. From the wife's love and desire to protect her fugitive brother a great tragedy ensues.

"The Renegade" is another thrilling "Western" full of interest, splendidly staged, and with most excellent photographic work. It is the story of a lawless husband, a wife who thought him dead and the usual result of marrying another.

Then comes the Nestor comedy which is always so good and clean. "In Dry Territory" is the title of one of the funniest stories ever filmed. This play is cleverly woven around the desire of the Woman's Temperance League to keep their city strictly temperance, and is full of the funniest of funny situations.

New York, N. Y.—Max Zimmerman and Aulvey M. Kennedy, of Brooklyn, are directors of the Motion Picture Manufacturing and Leasing Company, capitalized at $10,000.

BILLY THE DETECTIVE

Solax

CAST

Billy, the detective.....Billy Quirk
Mrs. Burns .....Fannie Simpson
Mr. Burns .....Darwin Karr
A Girl .....Marian Swayne

If Billy would not have bought a book on "How to Become a Detective," and if he would not have swallowed the stuff he read, and if he would not have attempted the science of deduction, he probably would have avoided considerable difficulty. But since Billy lacks the good sense to keep from doing the things he should not do, he makes an idiot of himself.

Thus in the production of "Billy, the Detective," the Solax release of April 19th, Billy is found following a false clue. Billy, the irrepressible, finds a diary and discovers an entry to the effect that Edward will be killed with a hatchet. Billy's newly acquired detective instinct is aroused. He traces down the owner of the diary, dogs her steps and shadows her constantly until he is observed and then he is forcibly impressed with the fact that he was making himself obnoxious. But Billy is determined to show his ability as a Sherlock Holmes, and so when he is ejected from the home of the people he persecutes with his idiosyncrasies, he runs off to get the police to assist him in making a round-up of the criminals. The police arrive in time to discover that the hatchet was used on Edward, the favorite family rooster.

THE THEATRE MAGNIFICENT

In these days of congratulatory chatter in the ranks of the trade concerning the many splendid temples of motion picturedom which are consistently and constantly being erected throughout the country, we must approach with a little more than mere interest the opening of the Rex Theatre, in Salt Lake City. As a theatre, it is more; as a monument to the energy, ability and aggressive initiative of a man to whom these qualities are not new acquaintances, it overtowers the usual gigantic feats so that we must literally look up to it.

William H. Swanson, the doer of things that are chronicled in the record of man's endeavor, is the guiding genius in the erection and preparation of the Rex Theatre. Perhaps this is why the Rex Theatre is what it is.

And here is what it is: without the flicker of a doubt or the shadow of a question, it is the handsomest, most completely equipped, most expensive, most sanitary, and best-lighted picture theatre in the United States, and probably in the world. It is 235 feet from the front to the back wall, the lobby is 12 feet deep, beautifully decorated along Grecian lines, the style of architecture which is becoming characteristic with our most artistically constructed theatres, and which, yet, is exclusive enough, with massive brass doors entering into the foyer, which is 30 by 30 feet, and beautifully decorated in subdued old French and Grecian style. The auditorium is 50 by 165 feet, with a seating capacity of over 1,600 on one floor.

Let the facts sink in; it does not require a very fluent imagination to conceive the beauty, grace and artistic attractiveness of the theatre from the above items. But to throw in the climax while the interest is at its greatest height, there is a crown of 1,500 electric lights, augmented by a complete indirect lighting system.

A pipe organ has been constructed by the Kimball Company at the interesting cost of $20,000. The instrument is unusual enough to be classified as second only to the famous Tabernacle organ. There are panelled wall figures in bas-relief, and the color effect is gold and purple. Gorgeous, but not gaudy.

Total lavishment for constructing and equipping the Rex Theatre is $150,000. Those that see it will say it was well worth it. Those who go to it will appreciate all that was done for their comfort and amusement. And after all else is said and done, we must suggest, although it may have already occurred to you, that it is such enterprise and thoroughness as are evidenced in the erection of the Rex Theatre that is directly responsible for the great amount of progress and advancement in the entire industry which we are just now talking so much about.

The Rex Theatre opens to the public Saturday, April 6th. It is to be a first run Independent house.

If it were not entirely unnecessary, we would wish the Rex Theatre all the luck its magnificence deserves. As it is, we just congratulate them.

TEN MINUTES TOO LATE

We all know what disappointment is, more or less, but how many of us are familiar with the sensation that follows the realization that one is ten minutes too late in obtaining a life's happiness. The Rex Company present the psychological speculation in a thrilling drama of the North, "The Seal of Time," released Sunday, April 14th.

The synopsis, on another page, reviews the story in detail. The purpose of this little item is to dwell on the psychological sensation itself.

If you returned from the Klondike ten minutes too late, or just in time to see "The Girl" being married to another, what would you think, say or do? After you've guessed a while, make a note to see the picture. That's the answer.

OUR WESTERN CORRESPONDENT

Hot Springs, Ark., April 4.—Unless memory fails me, which I do not think is the case, I believe that I stated in my last week's letter that in this communication I would give the result of the election held here on the day my last letter was written, an election that means much to the picture managers in general and amusement promoters in particular.

Well, the result was exactly as had been predicted—the liberal element experienced one of those old-time land slides, and it was just a question of majority. Judge J. B. Wood, a man of great ability, undoubted courage and leader of the reform ticket, was buried in an avalanche of votes, and Hon. Gip Witt, of Montgomery County, candidate for prosecuting attorney, elected by over 600 majority; and when one considers that there were five candidates in this race, one can get an adequate idea of the state of the public mind and the united desire to have a more liberal policy where the pleasure and amusement of visitors is concerned.

One, however, must not get the idea that the town is going to be "wide open." Far from it, believe me, for a "wide open" town would never be permitted for one minute by Mayor Waters, who managed the Witt campaign and to whom the people more than any one man owe Witt's election. The reform element only succeeded in stopping Sunday baseball and the Sunday moving picture shows. Where their crusade was directed against gambling they failed miserably. They made spectacular and sensational raids, arrested the gamblers, gave the county its share of the fines and pocketed lucrative fees. That is the situation in a nutshell, and Mayor Waters concluded that it would be a great deal better, since they could not stop gambling, to have that evil regulated, but permit the city to get the fines, deny the city officials fees, but turn this revenue, not only where the big club houses are concerned but also in the cases of the Sunday picture shows, into the city treasury, and that, ladies and gentlemen, is what is being done, or rather will be done when Gip Witt takes office.

Next season the visitors here will have their Sunday picture shows; the great major league ball teams—and there were five of 'em trained here this season—will have their Sunday baseball; the club houses will be opened, and there will be an orderly, conservative and liberal policy in force, which will bring the greatest enjoyment to the army of the city's patrons. The issue was never more clearly defined; the vote was never more emphatic—Hot Springs has come into its own.

I was talking the past week with several members of the Business Men's League and we were discussing the moving pictures of Hot Springs, which were taken about two weeks ago, when the subject turned to motion picture companies, and one of them asked me where the manufacturers send their players for the pictures. He was innocent and unsophisticated where motion photography was concerned and his eyes opened wide when I replied:

"Why, they send them everywhere. The American Company has headquarters in Southern California. The Bison clan has made the prairies most enjoyable; Kalem sends its company to Ireland for a special series of Irish pictures, and others distribute their companies all over the United States."

"Well, if that is the case, why, then, have none of them ever come to Hot Springs or its immediate vicinity?"

That was more than I could answer. Possibly the manufacturers themselves could reply to that question. It certainly isn't because I haven't tried to induce the big companies to come to "the valley of vapors" and take a series of pictures, for, time and again, I have called attention to the beautiful scenery that we have here, and there are landmarks of most romantic environments where the best possible results could be obtained.

Well, the outcome of it all was that the gentlemen suggested it might be a good plan for the Business Men's League to take the matter up at its next meeting. So, Mr. Manufacturer, if you are made the recipient of a booklet from this city, showing the various views of the resort and the surrounding territory, don't "ditch" it, but give it your thoughtful consideration. Look it over carefully and if you are in the mood to believe that the best scenery and the best natural stage for your pictures exist here in Hot Springs, send one of your scouts out to look the ground over. Get in touch with the Business Men's League, for with this organization working with you, it will be impossible for you to fall down on anything you attempt here. Think it over. Write the Business Men's League on this subject, and if you decide to send a company to Hot Springs and its immediate vicinity, you will find yourself surrounded by some of the greatest scenery that was ever offered to the camera.

The National Cash Register Company, of Dayton, has had men in the Southwest for some time showing by moving pictures the work that they are doing in their Ohio headquarters, and the Auditorium Theatre here has been engaged for a three days' exhibit, beginning next Monday week. Residents and visitors are being made the recipients of a neatly illustrated booklet, which shows the extent of the industry, but the thing that struck me as more prominent than anything else in this advertisement was the fact that, displayed in the largest type, was the announcement that "these views will all be shown in motion pictures." They simply cannot get results unless they go to the world's greatest amusement—motion photography. The show promises to be most interesting and each reel will be illustrated by a lecturer.

The best effects, however, so far as a picture goes, was seen at the New Central Theatre this week, where the great war picture by Kalem, "A Spartan Mother," was shown. Sidney M. Nutt, proprietor of the New Central, realized the value of the reel, and the manner in which the effects were handled made one realize that General Sherman's definition was about right. It was as near real war, so far as sound goes, as one would care to look at. With Carl Hanson in the pit with his numerous effects, and men specially engaged and trained by Hanson back of the stage—well, the picture was a positive sensation. It became the talk of the town. No one picture was ever given the attention that this one was, and the result brought out a packed house. That picture was rehearsed time and again just to get the effects right. Every one predicted that the New Central carried too much daily expense to be a success. As "Uncle" Andy Carnegie would say: "Hoot, Mon!" Why, the house has made money ever since it opened. The reason—well, it has everything that a first-class motion picture theatre should have.

Edison gave us a nice reel in "The Heir Apparent," and Selig's detective story, "The Slip," was a winner. The "high-brows" enjoyed immensely Vitagraph's yarn, "The Love of John Ruskin." Seated in front of me were two young women when this reel was on. By the following you will be able to note that they were not listed in any "blue book." Also, by the same token, they hold no membership card in literary or "high-brow" circles.

"Who was that there fellow, Ruskin?" asked one of the fair ones.

"Search me," replied her companion. "Well, will you look at him! Gee, ain't he stuck on that woman?"

"I never heard of him," said the first damsel. "Guess he must be a dead one, all right."

"I'll bet he's the guy what they name russet shoes after!" ejaculated the other, triumphantly, after which I removed to a remote corner of the theatre.

How sweetly true is the theory that "where ignorance is bliss it's folly to be wise!"

The New Era the past week decided to get all the election returns and plaster them on a screen hung in a prominent part of the city, so it was up to yours merrily to get the paraphernalia. I could not have succeeded were it not for the loyal co-operation of the moving picture houses.

I got the lamp and the curtain from J. W. Morrison, a coil from the Lyceum, slides from the New Central, and other incidentals from the Photo Play, while "Pat" Gillam, chief operator of the New Central, handled the slides, and the genial manager of the Photo Play, Mr. Belaschi, took down the returns. It was "some" journalistic moving picture event, believe me.

John Barnett, assistant secretary of the Business Men's League, informs me that he has been anxiously awaiting a reply to his letter to King Baggot. What's the matter, King? Haven't you got over your vacation here, that you keep such a precise and exacting a friend as Brother John on the anxious seat?

It is only very recently that concentrated research has been made into the haunts, habits and lives of the lower animals of Alaska and also of the primitive natives. And in fact, only since the advent of the moving picture into out midst have the most splendid results pertaining to the investigation of the industrial as well as the animal life of Alaska been brought to the East.

As it is many of the interesting phases of life in Alaska are as yet untouched by the camera. The first to bring us living scenes from Alaska—scenes that thrill the heart of the old "sour-dough" with vivid recollections of early days, and the heart of the untravelled with wonder and longing to probe further into the mysteries of the North

Capt. Kleinschmidt found his way into the Dawson territory before there was a Dawson, prospecting for gold. After the incoming of trade and commerce to Seward Peninsula, Alaska, he became owner of the well-known coast steamer "Diamond L," traversing the waters of Bering Sea from Nome to Teller, and also the "Diamond K," which picked up passengers at the ports of lower Alaska.

Latterly, as by dint of attention to duties, the reward of which is the financial ease which makes it possible for we humans to live, move, and have our being, he turned his attention to further research and adding to the work begun by others, and as a result of the labors of an entire season in channels, and under conditions in which he was so well versed, he has brought to the Carnegie Museum, at Pittsburgh, many specimens of rare scientific value, and a wonderful collection of the wild birds which have their haunts in far north Alaska.

Last week Capt. Kleinschmidt exhibited to a wondering throng at the Eden Musee a number of reels of moving pictures, in all some ten thousand feet of film. These pictures are said to be of excellent quality both as regards photography and subject, including illustrations of the lives of the Eskimos of that region and of Siberia. Also seal hunting, polar bear hunting, walrus hunting, etc.

One of the pictures at which the audience evinced most interest was one showing a polar bear and her cub swimming in the water. The naughty cub very disrespectfully catches unto mother's tail with its teeth, at which the mother bear turns on the young hopeful, administering a sound spanking with her big bear paw. Another point of interest is the attempt which was made by the Kleinschmidt party to rope a cub, at which the mother bear put up such a fight that out of sheer pity and admiration of the motherly sentiment shown by the bear, they at last let the cub go.

The walrus, the most ferocious of sea animals—treacherous, and having no scruples with regard to punching a hole from below with his tusk in the kiak or skin boat in which you are seated, has been photographed at a distance of about ten feet. Also some splendid pictures of seal life have been brought us by the Captain. Caribou, brown bear and mountain sheep also figure largely in the pictures. Perhaps the most difficult of all animals to hunt, let alone get within photographing distance of with a camera, and that a moving picture camera, is the mountain goat. This animal is most timid, scales the almost perpendicular rocks, and is to be found sunning itself in the crevices by those who are sure-footed enough to venture thither.

However, one must be not only sure-footed but armed with the cunning of the wild game hunter. In photographing wild animals with a moving picture machine two conditions of the elements must be combined to make sure results, there must be sunshine, and also the wind must blow from the direction of the animal toward you and not from your direction toward the animal, otherwise the turning of the crank of the camera would attract the animal, as well as it being able to scent the enemy. On one occasion Capt. Kleinschmidt tells us, he tried to photograph a mountain sheep in a splendid pose on the brink of a rock, but only six exposures were taken when the animal, becoming cognizant of the approach of a stranger, fled from view. Of course, the six pictures were practically useless when you consider that the moving picture camera takes sixteen exposures to the second. Some idea of the time the animal remained in position can be gained from this fact.

Capt. Kleinschmidt has shown these pictures in a number of Western cities, delighting his audiences. The Captain also tells the stories relating to the incidents represented upon the screen. He was accompanied on his hunting trip by Louis L. Lane, of San Francisco, and two interesting men of the hills, named by their comrades "Wild Bill" and "Pistol John." The expedition journeyed as far north as latitude 72 degrees, several miles above Wrangel Island, the farthest north ever reached in this longitude. So far as is known the Kleinschmidt party is only the second to land at Wrangel Island, this island being closed in by ice sometimes for ten miles around. Last season, however, being an unusually mild one the party was enabled to make a landing. They found there the survey monuments of the party who landed there in 1881 with the U. S. Revenue Cutter "Rodgers" in search of De Long, Arctic explorer, who gave his life in the interest of science.

An idea of the climatic conditions, however, can be gained from the fact that Lane was accompanied by his wife and ten-months-old child, both of whom enjoyed the trip immensely. The summer season in this north land, even at this latitude, is most delightful, so say those who have had the good fortune to have traversed that part of the globe.

Capt. Kleinschmidt will remain in New York for some little time, and during that time we hope that there will be several other opportunities of seeing the wonderful camera trophies which he has brought with him.

RELIANCE COMING RELEASES

A group of splendid scenarios written by Geo. W. Terwilliger and produced by James Kirkwood are soon to be released in filmed shape by the Reliance Company.

These films were exhibited a few days ago to a number of the press and were most enthusiastically received.

One of these pictures is deserving of special mention, owing to the fact that it has been written for and produced entirely by children. This picture is entitled "Prince Charming" and is the story of a little newsboy, who after picking up a glove belonging to a pretty little girl of high station, and delivering it to her, whereupon he was rewarded with a bag of sweet cakes, goes home, falls asleep and dreams the most elaborate of childish dreams. He dreams that the little girl is a Princess, and that he is commanded by her to appear at her court. Dressing himself in the beautiful costume sent by the Princess he sets out to the palace where he is received by the Princess amid her courtiers and where he makes love to the Princess, bringing upon himself the jealous reproaches of her other suitors, whereupon they plot to evict him, falling upon him when he is alone. He is, however, rescued by the Princess, who commands the Jester to clothe him in cloth of gold, after which she claims him as her husband.

"Little Billy" then wakes up, but "Gee! it was a great dream."

Prince Charming is for release on May 15th.

The others which are equally good in their class are, "The District Attorney's Conscience," in which the part of the district attorney is splendidly played by Henry Walthal and the prisoner by Jack Dillon.

SCENE FROM "PRINCE CHARMING"

"The Burglar's Reformation," a story with an excellent moral, and "His Love of Children," where Charles Herman plays with fine conception the part of one splendid character of a man.

All of these films are highly commendable from both a moral and an artistic point of view.

MR. JULIUS STERN RETURNS FROM WESTERN TRIP

Mr. Julius Stern, general manager of the Imp Films Company, has just returned from a three-weeks' stay at Los Angeles, California, on business for the company. The Californian company which includes E. J. Le Saint, Margarita Fischer, Harry Pollard, Edward Lyons, Louise Crolius, Ben Horning and Eugene Kelley, are engaged in the making of a series of pictures which will transcend in beautiful photographic qualities and dramatic interest all those which have so far been released from the Los Angeles negatives. These have been very popular, having won the favor of the public and the exhibitors on both sides of the Atlantic.

Mr. Stern's work was chiefly directed toward the proper organization of the West Coast Company, which is now in full going order, and O. K.'ing the future program.

An early release of the Imp Films Company, the direct result of Mr. Stern's visit, will be a scenic one of Los Angeles, showing the principal features of interest of a city which has been discovered to be an ideal metropolis for moving picture making.

Mr. Stern expressed enthusiasm about the climatic beauties of this section of California and the scope there for producing fine work. This quality is visible in the Imp Company's pictures.

In the course of his trip Mr. Stern ascertained that the Imp pictures were becoming increasingly popular with the theatrical men and the exhibitor. In Los Angeles the principal theatres are Independent and Imp films are popular there.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

There is a gentleman in Chicago, Ill., who kindly sends us a form letter in which he offers everything there is in the scenario writing line all for the small sum of $2.50. His is the cheapest "Course of Instruction" in the moving picture script line that we have ever encountered.

This new entrant in the seemingly popular field of "Instruction" happily does not present the merits of an "Association." Not he. But he has everything else there is and then some. His form letter would never fool the experienced author. To quote therefrom:

"Do you know that men and women are paid from $10 to $150 for an idea which they may write into picture form?" No; we don't know of any man or woman being paid $150 for scripts just now.

"Do you know that an unsuccessful writer has difficulty in selling a good story even after he has written one of real merit?" Again, Nunno! If a writer turns out a good story of real merit he is not unsuccessful. Good stories of real merit are in demand.

"Do you know why there are not more stories accepted and paid for?" We pass this one.

"Do you know why manufacturers reject stories?" Referred to members of the Chart class.

"Do you know what class of stories are wanted by certain manufacturers?" We do; we read the trade journals and the rejection slips.

Then the Windy City expert concludes page one of his form letter by the startling letters in caps: "I Know These Things."

The professor then narrates some of the good things in his instruction course. It includes:

The names and addresses of all the leading manufacturers of the world.

It tells you what crimes and actions are not permitted to pass the censors.

It tells you what length the manufacturers want scenes to run.

It tells you what words or dialogue to write into your "story."

It tells you what words you should not use in your dialogue.

It tells you what plots are in greatest demand, etc., etc.

A complete scenario written by "One of America's Best Scenario Writers" and sold to one of the "World's Greatest Manufacturers" goes with every "Course of Instruction."

The form letter ends with a postscript in which the instructor says he reads and revises scenarios written by those who purchase the course of instruction. (Price for this service not named.)

More extended comment upon this latest "Instruction School" is unnecessary. The form letter tells the story. We are conducting this department for the benefit of script writers and we advise the waste paper basket for such idiotic financial baits as the above.

Attend To Business

Attend strictly to the business in hand, meaning of course script writing. Visit the picture theatres and study the plays carefully. It is important. Read the trade journals closely. The manufacturers' advertisements and the synopsis of the stories will help you. Tell a good original story, as simply as possible—and again, study the picture plays.

The above, Ann Arbor, is our best advice. The observance of the advice will do you more good than all the "schools" in the world. If you wish a script criticised or revised, seek someone of established reputation—someone who has made good. Maybe your favorite scenario editor can suggest such an expert. It has been done. This department does not criticise or revise scripts but we will cheerfully direct you to an expert in whom we have fullest confidence. This service will cost you nothing.

Where Is the Need?

An author friend submits to us a copy of a letter sent out from the headquarters of the Author's Magazine, Philadelphia, and stating that steps were being taken to secure a charter for "The Associated Scenario Writers of America." The form letter made public asserts "that charter members shall be admitted for the sum of $10 each which includes the first year's dues, which are $15. The sum of $200 is needed to defray the cost of incorporating. The aims of the association are to protect the scenario writers of America; to take such legal steps as may be necessary for their mutual benefit, etc."

It is the third request we have received from script writers for our views upon the proposed association, which appeared to have responsible backing. We refer to the association in the past tense because, in our opinion, such an organization can never be successful. First-class script writers would never affiliate. Where is the need? The experienced and original author is marketing his scripts right along; he needs no protection; "legal steps" are unknown in his professional catagory. You cannot force a scenario editor to purchase stories he does not desire, association or no association. We even have the opinion that membership in such associations will seriously hamper the sale of good scripts. Manufacturers are human and they want no "legal steps" in their scenario departments. Suppose they issued orders to editors to refuse scripts submitted by association members? What are you going to do about it? There are as good fish in the sea as have ever been caught and the non-association writers might reap a harvest.

If this fool talk about "Scenario Writers' Association" "plot stealing," "legal steps," etc., continues long it will result in but one measure. That will be the closing of the markets to the freelance writers. Like Thanhouser, the other concerns will write what scripts they desire in their own editorial departments and tell the outside writers to go hang! The non-association writers, struggling to succeed, will suffer along with the rest.

Better frown down all "organization," "mutual benefit," "protection" agitators and saw wood. In nine cases out of ten these walking delegates have motives other than the real benefit of the writer at heart.

O. Henry, Eugene Wood, Richard Harding Davis, Rudyard Kipling, Alfred Henry Lewis, David Graham Phillips and the rest, graduated from the newspaper office into the field of authorship and won out by their own heartbreaking efforts—not by the aid of some "Authors' Association." If you are looking for a "school" try a year in some newspaper office. It's the school of human interest and the city editor will teach you how to write. If you feel that you can write anyway, why scribble ahead. However, save your money to buy postage stamps and leave "associations" strictly alone.

WM. LORD WRIGHT.

INTO THE DESERT

It is no unusual thing nowadays for a film to contain a number of thrilling "falls" by actors appearing therein, but to date such "falls" have been more or less "faked." At least, this has always held true when the "fall" was made by some principal in the picture. Frequently acrobats have been engaged to do real "falls," but they naturally played minor roles. In a Thanhouser Florida reel called "Into the Desert," out Friday, April 19th, there are two real "falls" by real principals, setting a new versatility record for the photoplayers.

FALLING LEAVES

By Madame Alice Blaché

The white curtains of Dr. Earl Headley's small laboratory had been drawn aside, and a soft light came through the window, showing the nickel plate carefully burnished, the room neatly arranged, and the crystal bottles and steel instruments bright and shining. What was the meaning of this careful preparation? A place usually full of gloom transformed into a room replete with joy and happiness. Dr. Headley had just gained a great victory. After years of hard toil and patience, he had discovered a wonderful serum, capable of curing consumption even in its second stage. Drs. Martin and Porter, his dearest friends and medical associates, were there by special invitation. They came to see the positive results of his great discovery; they viewed with wonder several of his patients and congratulated him heartily on the joy he was about to bring to other poor afflicted ones. Let us leave the clever doctor for a moment and view the attractive home of Mrs. Thompson. The bay window of the parlor facing the west is opened wide and the last rays of the autumn setting sun are lighting up the attractive interior. Winifred Thompson is reading a pretty fairy tale to Trixie, her little five-year-old sister. Mrs. Thompson is seated near them, doing some fine embroidery. An artist would find this an interesting picture to put on his canvas. Winifred, only sixteen, a pretty blond, with finely chiseled features and soft curly hair falling to her shoulders, but with thin white hands and fragile body. She continues to read, while the big wondering eyes of little Trixie showed the deep interest she is taking in the marvelous fairy tale, but alas! there is some shadow hovering around this young, beautiful girl, even though she seems surrounded by a happy home and wealthy parents. The icy hand of death is creeping slowly toward the lungs of this poor, afflicted one. Her big eyes are too bright, her cheeks have a deep hectic flush and an apparent weakness is visible in every move.

A mother's instinct is very keen, so that when Winifred begins to cough Mrs. Thompson runs quickly to her, tenderly envelops her in a shawl, which she wraps around the girl's slender shoulders, and then closes the open window. "You have read enough, my dear child, for to-day." "Oh, mama," says little Trixie, "please let Winifred finish the story. The prince charming is just bursting through the flames to save his beloved sweetheart, the beautiful princess." "No, Trixie, your sister is tired, no more of the fairy tale until to-morrow." Trixie's big eyes filled with tears. Winifred, who adores her little sister, is deeply touched by her emotion. "Don't cry any more, little sister, you are going to sing that dear little Scotch song for me, and I will play your accompaniment." Winifred rises and seats herself at the piano. Little Trixie forgets her tears and in a childish voice begins the song. All at once, Winifred ceases to play, her face depicts great suffering, and a hacking cough shakes her fragile body. She raises her handkerchief to her lips and on taking it away, finds that it is stained with blood. She realizes at once what this fatal sign means. Her mother reaches her just as she rises from the piano stool and catches the poor fainting girl in her arms. The servants are called, Winifred is taken to her room and laid upon her bed. Little Trixie is left alone in the parlor. She cannot quite comprehend what has happened, but she feels that her sister faces some great danger and her little heart is almost broken. She wonders why her sister is so pale and why mother is so deeply overcome. The family doctor has been called in haste and is now with Mr. and Mrs. Thompson in the sick room. Later they return to the parlor and Trixie, who is hidden in a corner of the room, listens attentively to their conversation. It is difficult for her to understand the medical terms used by the doctor, but, at last, he says something which is clear to the childish brain. The doctor leaves, and the husband and wife slowly return falling from the trees. "I am sorry to say, my good friends, that your daughter Winifred will surely die before the last leaf falls from those trees outside." Poor Mrs. Thompson falls weeping in the arms of her husband, the doctor leaves, and the husband and wife slowly return to Winifred's room. Trixie, left alone, softly goes to the window, looks sadly at the falling leaves and asks herself what mysterious link there is between the falling leaves and the death of her sister. Night time had arrived. Trixie, in her little nightdress, is kneeling by a statue of the Virgin Mary, praying with all her heart for her poor sick sister, Winifred. Faithful Bessie, the maid-of-all-work, takes her up and puts her to bed and tells her to close her eyes and try to go to sleep. After watching her for a little while, believing that Trixie was in a deep slumber, she leaves the room, taking the lamp with her. Through the window came the full rays of the autumn moon. Trixie begins to move, raises her head from the pillow and listens. She is sure that Bessie has gone downstairs, as she can no longer hear her footsteps. Little Trixie begins to think, looks out of the window and watches the leaves which are constantly falling. "Oh! those leaves! those leaves! always falling; can nothing stop them?" All at once her little face brightens and she seems seized with a sudden inspiration. She feels sure that she has hit upon a plan to prevent Winifred's death. No matter what difficulties she may encounter she determines to put her plan into operation. She slips from her bed, puts on her little soft felt slippers and opens the door of the bedroom, tiptoes down the hall and goes into the linen room, opens the drawer in the sewing machine, takes out a ball of darning thread and a pair of scissors. Swiftly and quietly, she goes downstairs, and stands before the door leading into the garden. It is hard for her to open this big door. She has to reach up to even get hold of the knob, and her little fingers seem hardly strong enough to turn the big key in the lock, but Winifred must be saved at any cost. She opens the door and finds herself in the garden. The moonbeams fall on this little white figure. For a moment Trixie seems filled with fear as she realizes that she is all alone in the great big garden, but then her thoughts of Winifred give her renewed courage. She grasps the scissors in her tiny hand, takes the ball of darning thread in the other and begins to cut off long pieces and attach them to different leaves which she picks up from the ground. Then she attaches these leaves by the thread to the lower branches of the trees. "Now I have found a means," she thinks, "to keep the leaves from falling and Winifred will not die." She is so deeply absorbed in her work that she does not hear an approaching footstep, but suddenly the shadow of a man is cast across the footpath and a big manly voice startles her. "What are you doing here, little girl, at such an hour and in your little nightdress?" Trixie is frightened and starts to run away, but the man places his hand upon her shoulder, and turning her around, he sees her big eyes filled with tears, and she notices that a sweet smile is playing across his lips. Realizing that he seems friendly, she tells him about her sister Winifred; what she heard the family doctor say and that she is using this method to prevent her sister from dying. Needless to say that the man who was speaking to Trixie was none other than the famous Dr. Earl Headley, who was returning from a meeting of some famous medical men and who had been attracted to the little figure in the garden. Trixie listens to him as he tells her who he is and she begs him to come with her and try to help her sick sister. He lifts Trixie in his strong arms and goes toward the door of the house. As he does so, he is met by Mrs. Thompson and the maid, who are very much frightened, having discovered that little Trixie was not in her room. He explains to Mrs. Thompson how he found Trixie and what she was doing and hands her his professional card, and assures her that he will do anything he can to aid her sick daughter.

An hour later he has injected some of his wonderful serum into the arm of poor, sick Winifred. A year later we find Winifred thoroughly cured. She is looking out of the window, watching the falling leaves but evidently in anxious anticipation of the arrival of someone. Little Trixie is watching her sister from a recess in the back of the parlor. A quick footstep is heard crossing the garden path. Winifred's eyes gleam with a sudden light of intense happiness. In a moment Dr. Headley is seated at her side and holding her hand. He asks to feel her pulse, finds it beating regularly and tells her she has no further use for medicine. As she starts to withdraw her hand he prevents her from so doing, draws her to him, and with a look of deep love in his eyes, presses his lips to hers. In the meanwhile, Trixie, having noted what has been going on, has left the room and returned with the ball of darning thread, with which she had tied the leaves, and tiptoeing toward Winifred and Dr. Earl, she quickly winds the thread about them while with laughter they catch her, and Dr. Headley, lifting her to his lap, holds both Winifred and Trixie close to his heart. Little Trixie had not only tied the leaves, but had also tied these two hearts, which from now on would beat as one.

MR. EUGEN LA BOUSSE

Mr. La Bousse, who is well known to the trade through his long connection with the arrangement of the Bound Brook Studio and factory of Pathe Freres, as we understand, severed his connection with the Pathe Freres American company. We endeavored to get full information from Mr. La Bousse, but he was too reticent to tell us his immediate plans for the future. We wish him every success in whatever undertaking he associates himself with, believing that his experience will be a wonderfully good asset to any manufacturer in the industry.

THE KID AND KIDLET AGAIN

The Thanhouser Kid and her two-years-old colleague, the Thanhouser Kidlet, make their latest appearance in a comedy picture released Tuesday, April 16th, "The Baby Bride." It is a dandy little story in which Marie, as a boy, seeks to elope with Baby Helen. Marie's mother, in the play, is a widow and Helen's father a widower. They are brought together through the efforts of the Kid to skip off with the Kidlet. So while the tots can't wed, their parents do, and the whole reel furnishes you with a lot of fun and novelty.

THE DUEL

BY VIRGINIA WEST

Adapted from a Reliance Release

THE childhood and early girlhood of June Ross had been spent in peaceful ignorance of anything but her mountain home and the ways of her mountain people, until one day, far below the heights, there came an unfamiliar sound. A railroad was coming and the work had commenced.

Many hours June spent sitting on an overhanging cliff and listening to the sounds which arose from the valley below her. Sometimes she could see the figures of the workmen and mules as they moved to and fro.

With the coming of the railroad came also new citizens of the little town in the valley. Among them was Lewis Douglas, a young lawyer.

Douglas now and again had time to go for a tramp, as sometimes happens to young lawyers, and having nowhere to go but in the mountains he went there.

It was there, seated upon her cliff, that he first saw June. She sprang to her feet when she saw him and stood alert, with wide-open eyes, like a surprised doe. Never in all her eighteen years had the girl seen anything like this man, and all her natural mountain wariness came into play.

"I'm afraid I startled you," said Douglas apologetically.

The wide eyes only stared.

"You have a fine view from here."

The girl nodded.

"Well, I'll go on, I reckon."

The girl showed neither disappointment nor pleasure at this announcement.

The young man continued his walk, but his eyes were not so quick to see and appreciate the beauties around him as they were earlier in the day. He was very thoughtful. Somehow the girl on the cliff insisted upon coming before his mind's eye.

Even after he reached his boarding house the vision persisted. He saw the crimson dress of rough calico, with a background of dark green rhododendron leaves, and below it the tanned, bare feet. And her eyes—he could not forget her eyes. So like the eyes of the forest creatures, and yet with a depth he had never seen in the eyes of any other woman.

When John Douglas went to bed that night he told himself that he was an idiot. Nevertheless he dreamed of redbirds poised for flight on a rhododendron bush and doe's eyes gazing at him from the depths of a forest.

When Douglas left June she stood for a while listening to his retreating footsteps and then reseated herself on the cliff. One could not exactly say that her thoughts were of the young man. She was indifferent to him as far as her consciousness was concerned. But a new element had suddenly been introduced into her life and it had made her thoughtful—one might say subconsciously thoughtful.

The girl was in this mood when a young mountaineer came through the bushes and seated himself beside her.

"I reckoned you'd be here," he said.

The girl looked at him, but said nothing.

The young fellow sat for a while digging the muzzle of his gun into the earth. Then he said:

"How's the railroad comin' on? Workin' pretty fast, ain't they?"

"I reckon they are," she finally answered. Then turning suddenly to him, she said:

"Jim, things ain't a goin' to be the same fer us folks when that railroad gets done."

"How d'you mean?" he asked.

"Well," said June hesitatingly, "I don't just know how to say what I mean. We ain't never mixed with no other kind o' folks, you know, Jim, but I reckon there is other kinds what'll come into these hills now."

"Well, s'pose they do? They better not pester me," he said, handling his gun significantly.

The girl took no notice of his tone or words.

"Don't you reckon they know a lot more'n we do?" she asked.

"I reckon mebbe they do, but they can't shoot like us."

The girl saw that she had an unsympathetic listener and relapsed into silence. When Jim suggested that it was time to go to supper she arose and followed him without a word.

Jim Jackson was, in the eyes of these mountain folk, the accepted suitor of June. As a matter of fact, Jim had not yet declared his love, much as he had wanted to do so. For, although he was brave enough when it came to shooting men, his power even of speech failed him when he faced the steady eyes of this girl.

June had, in her heart, chosen this man for her mate and she was only waiting for him to speak.

It was not until some weeks later that the girl saw Douglas again. He had visited the cliff several times in the hope of finding her there, but was always disappointed.

One afternoon, when business was dull and he didn't feel like working anyway, Douglas climbed the mountain road and turned off onto the trail that led to the cliff. He called himself names when he did it. Then he straightway called himself more names, for, he said, couldn't a man like the looks of a mountain girl and want to talk to her without being in love with her? Of course he could.

This time he was not disappointed. The girl sat on the dry moss, her back against a rhododendron root, and her bare feet straight out in front of her. She was looking out over the valley at some buzzards circling round a cliff on the other side.

The young man peeped through the leaves and said very quietly, "May I come in?"

The girl looked around quickly. "Oh, it's you," she said. Then added, "I don't care if you come in."

"Thank you."

Douglas threw himself down on the moss, a few feet from the girl. His hat had fallen off and the light breeze blew his hair from his brow. June looked at him with impersonal admiration.

Douglas laughed.

"I wonder what you're thinking?" he said.

"You ain't so dudie lookin.' Jim said all the fellers from the town was dudes," came the startling reply.

Douglas laughed again. "Thank you," he said. After a pause he asked, "Did I frighten you the other time you saw me?"

"No, I wa'n't skeert, but I hadn't never seen nobody like you'uns before."

"And have you since?"

Douglas felt an absurd twinge of resentment toward some unknown man.

"N—no. No, I ain't, but——"

"But what?"

The girl became suddenly confused.

"But what?" Douglas persisted.

"I dunno. I kind o' got used to you, I reckon."

Douglas looked at her almost eagerly. "Used to thinking of me, you mean?"

"No, I ain't just been thinkin' of you'uns.' I been——" June hesitated. "Oh, I dunno how to say it."

"Won't you try?" urged Douglas gently. He was beginning to see in June more than a mere mountain girl who stirred his pulse and pleased his artistic sense.

"Well, you looked kind o' diff'rent from us an' talked diff'rent, an' I got to thinkin' they must be a lot o' folks like you where you come from, an'——"

The girl stopped, at a loss for words.

"I know. You mean that you weren't thinking about me as a man, but just as a representative of the people I come from. Is that it?"

June looked thoughtful for a moment; then a sudden light broke over her face. "Yes, that's it," she said delightedly.

They had come to a better understanding now, and the girl began to talk more freely.

"Yes, I been happy," she said, in answer to a question. "But since I been a-watchin' that railroad buildin' I been thinkin' mebbe it won't be the same to live here and not know nothin'."

The young man was silent. He began to realize that he was face to face with a real and a very serious problem and responsibility. This young girl was just awakening to the realities of life outside herself and her immediate surroundings. He knew that she was by nature one of those sensitive beings who can be made or marred by a word in the right or wrong direction.

That June must leave her mountain home was inevitable. Douglas saw this plainly and knew that it would be impossible, if wise even, to shut out the light that had recently dawned upon her soul. So the question was how to guide her aright that she might know the false from the true.

It seemed to Douglas that a great responsibility had fallen on him. He tried to shake himself free from the thought, telling himself that it was no affair of his; that he had seen this girl but twice, and it was ridiculous to concern himself with her affairs.

But in his heart he knew he was not telling himself the truth. He knew—as he sat with this simple girl gazing out over the valley—he knew that unconsciously she was reaching out her hand to him for guidance and that he must give it.

He could not repress a sigh as he turned toward her.

"You have not told me your name," he said.

"June Ross," she answered simply, adding: "What's yours?"

"My name's Lewis Douglas," he answered, and then after a pause he said, "Tell me about yourself."

"There ain't nothin' to tell." She looked at him in surprise that he would ask such a question.

"Tell me about your people."

"Well, there's dad an' stepmam. Mammy died a couple o' years ago."

"Who's Jim?" asked Douglas, remembering that she had spoken of him.

"Jim's keepin' company with me. He ain't spoke yet. He's too skeert." The girl spoke without embarrassment.

Douglas opened his lips to speak, but closed them again without uttering a sound. No, he said to himself, he had no right to ask that question.

When the young lawyer left the girl that afternoon they were acknowledged friends, and he knew that she would be there at his next coming.

When Douglas climbed to the cliff a week later he carried under his arm several books. June had the very scant knowledge of reading that comes from four months' attendance at a mountain district school.

Eagerly the girl devoured, with Douglas' help, the books that he brought her. So quick and anxious to learn was she that he never tired of teaching her. With his help she was fast losing her mountain dialect. She was quick to appreciate the difference in her speech and her teacher's and as quick to take advantage of her opportunity.

While June's lessons were progressing through the summer, Jim was very busy with other matters. He did not see so much of the girl as formerly, for rumors were going around through the mountain settlements that certain mountaineers had better be on close guard.

Now that strangers were coming into the valley it was not always easy to know a revenue officer at sight.

So there was much creeping from shelter to shelter through the laurel thickets, and Jim was on close watch most of his time.

However, Jim Jackson was honest in his belief. He could not see why a man had not a right to make whiskey if he wished, so long as he made it simply for his own use and as a means of treating his friends with hospitality. The Government thought differently, and so from time to time there were rather lively times.

That is how it happened that Jim Jackson didn't know of June's new friendship. He took it for granted she spent most of her time at her favorite spot, and he was glad to have her out of danger of seeing a fight.

One afternoon, toward the end of the summer, Jim made up his mind to find June and speak his heart to her. The danger of trouble from the officers had passed for the present, and he was in fine spirits.

"June," he said when he had found her, "I been-a lookin' fer you. I got somethin' to ask you."

"What you want-a say?" asked the girl encouragingly.

"Can't you guess?"

Embarrassment was coming upon the big mountaineer.

"Well, I might guess, but why don't you tell me?"

Silence for a moment.

Then the man hastily said, "Are you goin' to the meetin' at the schoolhouse?"

June cast at him a glance not unmixed with disgust. "I might," she said.

"Will you—will you—go with me?"

"I reckon."

There was a long pause.

"Sometimes," he said finally, "sometimes my cabin's awful kind o' lonesome."

June did not speak.

"I reckon I ought-a live closer to the rest o' the folks."

The girl was thoroughly out of patience now. If a man wanted a girl to marry him, why didn't he say so? What she said to him was:

"I reckon you had—or farther away."

Poor Jim! He didn't know what to do. How could he know what subtle influence had been at work on this girl?

"I reckon I'll be goin' now," he said.

"All right," she answered, but she was watching a buzzard sailing, outlined against the setting sun, and did not look at him.

Jim left her sitting near the edge of the rock.

The sun soon sank behind a distant knob and the buzzard dropped down to his home on the cliff across the valley.

The smell of pine and damp ferns and rich black earth reached June as she sat very still on her cushion of moss. She drew in with a deep breath the odors she loved. Then she sighed. A longing had taken possession of her—a longing she could not have named. She was half angry at Jim for not speaking out, and yet she was some way almost glad he hadn't. She had taken it for granted that she would marry Jim, and——

A twig snapped and June turned quickly. Douglas stood as though awaiting her command to enter.

"Come, sit down," she said simply. He did so without a word.

June wondered if he looked pale only because of the light and the dark background of green leaves.

They sat in silence until the first star twinkled above the black wall opposite them. Then Douglas spoke:

"June, there is something I must talk to you about. Perhaps I should not; I do not know. I have thought much about it day and night and now I must speak. June, I love you. With all my heart I love you. I——"

The girl sprang to her feet. "No, no," she cried; "you must not love me. I'm ignorant and—and—I ain't the kind o' girl you must love."

She was almost sobbing in her intensity.

"But you are the girl I love. I have thought of the difference in our positions—of your ignorance of the things that other women know. Yes, I've thought of it all, and I love you. June, June, say that you love me!" He held both her hands tightly in his. "Don't say it unless it's true, but if you can, say it now, now!"

June took away her hands and stood looking into his face.

"You will teach me? You will let me go to school before anybody knows I'm your wife?"

"Yes, yes, dear; everything shall be just as you wish it. I am not rich, but I have enough for what you wish, and it shall be so." He waited until she should speak again.

Softly and slowly she put her arms around his neck and whispered: "I love you. Teach me to be like the others and I'll go with you."

Suddenly a man emerged from the rhododendron. "So you come around stealin' another feller's gal, do you?" He took a step toward the pair. June stepped between the two men, but Douglas put her gently aside.

"What are you talking about?" he asked. "Is this girl promised to you?"

"Ever'body knows she's mine," said Jim angrily.

"Has she said she would marry you?"

"Well, no, she ain't said so, but we been-a keepin' company fer a year or more, an'——"

Douglas looked at June standing white and tense in the twilight. The girl knew Jim's record with men was very different from his love-making, and she was afraid for Douglas.

"June," he asked quietly, "do you love this man?"

Her answer was very low but distinct in the evening silence:

"No."

"Then I think there's but one thing for you to do," he said to Jim.

Sullenly and with threatening glance the mountaineer left them alone.

"When will you take me away?" asked the girl as soon as Jim had gone.

"To-morrow, dear, if you wish it. It cannot be too soon for me."

The next morning Douglas was surprised to see Jim Jackson enter his office, closing the door behind him.

"Mebbe you'uns don't know it," he began, "but there's honor among us mountain folks as well as the rest o' you. It might be diff'rent, but it's honor jest the same."

Douglas waited for him to finish.

"Now you'se took my gal," he continued, "and I got to fight you. There ain't no other way."

Douglas saw that the fellow was in deadly earnest, so he said:

"In what way do you wish to fight?"

"I ain't perticler, but our way is fer the two of us to choose straw an' the shortes' straw gits the first shot. If he misses t'other feller shoots."

"That's as good as any, I reckon," said Douglas quietly. Then he thought of June and said:

"Look here, I'm no coward, but what's the use of this? June doesn't love you and won't marry you if you kill me. So what's the good of it?"

"She would-a married me if you'd-a stayed away. We got to shoot," he said doggedly.

Douglas saw it was of no use. He took a whisk broom from the wall and handed it to Jim. The mountaineer pulled two straws out and bit off one of them. He held them out to Douglas without a word.

Slowly the lawyer extended his hand and took hold of one straw. Jim gave a short laugh. "You'se got yer chance, stranger; go ahead," he said.

Douglas almost lost his courage. He felt that he could have faced death himself, but to deliberately try to kill another man—he sickened at the thought.

After a moment his mind cleared a little. Why, he needn't kill the man; he can simply wound him enough to keep him quiet until he and June have settled matters more securely.

Jim had already taken his stand and was waiting. Douglas fired. The shot cut through Jim's heavy trousers and the man stepped forward unhurt.

"Thank God," breathed Douglas as he laid down Jim's pistol.

"Mebbe you won't thank Him when I git through."

Douglas started. He had forgotten that Jim could shoot if he missed killing him.

Silently he took his place against the wall.

"Say, stranger, if you don't mind I reckon I'll take my shot some other time—mebbe, not for a long time."

Douglas was only too ready to agree to that. He had health and youth and it seemed that the future could bring only good to him.

The Southern mountaineers do not bother much with newspapers. If they happen to keep away from a town for long they may know very little about the affairs of the State.

Five years after the event of his duel with Lewis Douglas, Jim Jackson rode into the little town in the valley. He had not been there for six months and knew very little of the State or even county affairs.

He picked up a paper on the hotel porch as he sat with his chair tilted back and his feet on the railing. His eye caught the name of Douglas, and at once the old wound was opened. As he read he discovered that Douglas had just been elected Governor of the State, and that among the things he had promised his party was the wiping out of the moonshine industry.

Jim sat for some time quietly chewing.

"Mebbe he will an' mebbe he won't," he said. "I wonder if he's fergot that chanct I haven't took?"

That night Jim was on his way to the capital.

When the name of Jim Jackson was brought to Douglas in his study at the Governor's mansion, he knew what it meant.

He stood waiting for the man when he entered. There was no chance of argument or persuasion now. He had a debt and he must pay it.

"I am ready," he said, and took his place against the wall as he had done five years before.

Jim raised his pistol very deliberately and aimed.

Neither man heard the door open, nor heard a soft patter on the carpet, so intent were both upon the work in hand.

"Oh, my God!" groaned the mountaineer, and in a moment he had dropped the pistol on the floor.

"My papa," lisped a baby voice, and a tiny hand pointed from the chair into which the little girl had climbed to the man against the wall.

All the deeply buried tenderness in Jim's nature seemed to come to the surface with a bound, and in an instant he realized that he was about to commit a crime. He took the little girl in his arms and carried her gently to the door.

Coming back to Governor Douglas he put out his hand and said:

"Well, I reckon the feud's over, Gov'ner. The kid and her mammy needs you worse than I do."

REFLECTIONS FROM THE FIRESIDE

BY VIRGINIA WEST

Adapted from the Imp Release of that name

CAPTAIN RAYNOR sat in his lodging-house room, his empty sleeve hanging dejectedly by his side and his sparkling mint julep standing untouched upon his table.

The Captain was thinking. That morning, when he took his daily walk down to the post-office for his mail, he had received a letter that had stirred his memory.

He was scarcely conscious of the landlady's entrance when she brought in his usual afternoon julep—for the days were still warm enough for that delicious drink, even though one needed a bit of a fire in the evening.

But to-day the ice in the glass at the Captain's elbow had long been melted when he sighed and reached for the drink. With the first taste he frowned slightly and started to call the landlady, when he suddenly remembered how long he had been sitting there. "Dear, dear," he said, "my old wits must have gone wool-gathering." Then thinking that a warm julep is better than no julep at all, he began sipping the liquid—a little more hastily than usual, it must be confessed.

The Captain set down the glass, sighed and took from his inside coat pocket a letter. Deftly, with his one hand, he drew it from the envelope and spread it on the table before him. "Dolly Dutton," he said. "So you have come back to live alone in your little birthplace—in little Fairfield. Well, well." Then in a softer voice he said, "Little Dolly Dean."

The Captain took off his glasses, wiped them and put them on again.

Only that morning, rummaging in his trunk, the gentle old man had come across a little package of letters which had touched him deeply. And then, to think of that note coming on the very same day! But strange coincidences do happen in life, and here was a real live one now.

"At four o'clock," read the Captain again. "Why, bless me, it's three now!" he exclaimed excitedly as he looked at his watch.

So quickly he made his toilet—even handicapped as he was—that he stood before his mirror at a quarter to four, dressed even to his broad felt hat.

Catching sight of his empty sleeve in the glass, he lifted it gently—a little sorrowfully—yet with a touch of pride.

"She has never seen this," he murmured.

When Captain Raynor stood waiting in the cosey little sitting-room of the Widow Dutton he felt a queer little feeling around his heart, that was pathetically like the ghost of a feeling he had had forty years ago. And yet the ghost was not so pale, after all.

"Dolly," he said, when the little lady, white of hair but youthful of figure, came sweeping into the room. "Little Dolly Dean."

"Dolly Dutton now and for many years," she said as she gently withdrew her hand from his.

"What is the old saying, 'Change the name and not the letter, marry for worse and not for better'? I hope that was not your case, Dolly?"

"He was a good man, William, and always treated me with loving kindness."

Her tone had the ring of truth, but she turned away her eyes.

After the maid had brought the tea and cakes and the old couple were left alone again, Mrs. Dutton poured the tea. The Captain sat watching her like one fascinated.

"It's two lumps, isn't it, William?" she asked, and in her eyes was a soft and quiet light.

"Do you remember that, Dolly—after forty years?"

"Yes, I remember. My memory is very good."

They sipped their tea in silence for a time. Then Dolly Dutton said: "You have never married, William?"

"No, I have never married."

Mrs. Dutton stole a glance at her companion, but he was gazing into his tea cup.

"Have some tea, William," she said.

"No."

He sat silent, turning his cup round and round. Finally he spoke very slowly and almost reverently, as one entering a holy place:

"Dolly, when did you hear that the report of my being killed was false?"

"A year after my marriage, William." Her voice was very low.

"Did you ever know that I saw you and your husband leaving the church after your wedding?"

"Oh, William, you were there and I didn't know?" she cried.

"Yes. No one knew. I had just come back and I went away again." He paused for a moment.

"I was badly wounded, you know, and they all thought I was killed. I left my arm on the battlefield. I would gladly have given my life for the cause."

The old man's eyes blazed for a moment as he thought of those stirring days.

"You were my brave William," said the white-haired Dolly. She leaned over and took the empty sleeve gently in her hand.

"Yes, your William, Dolly Dean. I have always been your William." Captain Raynor laid his hand over the wrinkled one on his sleeve.

"Let me give you some tea," she said hastily. "I am forgetting my hospitality."

"Not a bit of it. It is enough to let me sit and look at you."

"Now, now, William," she laughed, shaking her finger at him, "I am afraid you are becoming a flatterer in your old age."

"Don't call me old," protested the Captain with great show of indignation. "I shall be but sixty-three next month."

"Then you must know that I was sixty a week ago," whispered Mrs. Dutton.

"Why, we are just in the prime of life, Dolly," declared the Captain.

Suddenly they both fell into silence again.

The old lady forgot her tea and sat gazing into the fire.

"William," she said finally, very softly.

"Yes."

"There is something I want to show you."

She pulled aside the folds of lace at her neck and exposed to view an old-fashioned necklace.

"Dolly! You have kept it—my boyish gift?"

"Yes, I have kept it."

The old man set down his tea cup tremblingly and went to the window, where he stood looking out.

The woman did not see his face. Over it passed the signs of many thoughts and feelings—youthful struggles, battles fought and fought again, then victory and peace.

When he turned toward the woman by the fire the peace had come back to his face, but with it was a quiet sadness.

'I must go now. I shall come again, if I may," he said.

She stood by the fire, the flickering flame throwing a golden light on her white hair.

The Captain was thinking how young she looked and how much like the girl she used to be, but he did not speak.

"William, I wish you wouldn't go so soon," she said.

"It is not soon, my dear Dolly; I have been here a very long time, I fear."

He took her hand and bent over it as he had done forty years before. "May I come again?" he said.

"Yes," she answered.

He turned to leave the room, but suddenly stopped short.

"William," she cried.

The Captain turned slowly toward her. Could he believe his eyes? There stood his Dolly, holding out her arms to him. In two steps he had reached her side and put his arm close around her.

"Oh, William, we have lost so many years," she sighed. I could not bear to lose another moment; I could not let you go again!"

"You really love me now?" he asked brokenly.

"William, I must tell you this once, and then I'll never say it again—I have always loved you, and you only."

"My Dolly Dean," he whispered against her snowy hair.

In the dancing shadows thrown by the fitful flames their lips met in the kiss so long denied.

ANOTHER THANHOUSER BUNCO YARN

There is one nice thing about Thanhouser bunco stories and that is that the bunco man is always defeated at his own game, that his cleverness hence is never held up for the spectator to admire and copy. He is shown in all his braininess and brightness, but he is sure to meet a natural check. He receives it from a "woman from the country" in the latest Thanhouser bunco story, and she looks "green" enough to be trimmed to a turn. But she turns and trims the trimmer, and she does it so naturally and so logically that it looks like every-day life. This very smooth story is issued under the title "An Easy Mark" on Apr. 12.

KINEMACOLOR OPENING AT GARDEN THEATRE

Kinemacolor opened with their second edition of the Durbar at the Garden Theatre on Monday night to a large and enthusiastic audience.

The Kinemacolor Company have grasped one great and important truth in connection with the exhibition of the moving picture that has never been properly understood or interpreted by exhibitors, it is that any picture, even a still picture, must have a proper setting in order to throw forward the true intention of the picture.

The moving picture needs something more than mere scenic setting, it must have appropriate atmosphere and this atmosphere is best and most easily obtained by musical accompaniment which sympathizes with the sentiment of each different scene.

All of this in combination do we get at a kinemacolor exhibition. From the opening with the beautiful color effects against the old Taj Mahal Temple of India in the background, to the close of the program, showing the execution of the last sad rites of the Battleship Maine and the conveying of the caskets containing all that was left of the brave sailors who perished at the time of the blowing up of the Maine, aboard the North Carolina. The audience was all enthusiasm on Monday night.

Although the Durbar has been "done brown" by the press in different parts of the country, it would be difficult not to refer to it again at each opportunity given of viewing these wonderful scenes—more wonderful in their magnificence than we of the more sombre Western hemisphere can fully realize without having seen.

An entire new set of films illustrative of the Indian Durbar and happenings incident to it were exhibited at the Garden Theatre on Monday night, among which were the ruins of ancient Delhi and a visit to the Mosque of Katab Minar, which scenes are most interesting.

The second edition of Durbar films is, if anything, better than the first, but all of the kinemacolor Durbar series have been so splendid that you find yourself like a discontented child when the entire series fails to materialize in one evening, which would be an impossibility, owing to the large number of intensely interesting scenes to be shown, and which, if all were shown, might stretch on into the "wee sma' hours."

The first edition, however, is being shown at the Manhattan Theatre, and we are glad to know that it has not been withdrawn. Some of the former scenes are happily included in the second edition, such as the elephant pageant and the wonderful military review showing 50,000 soldiers in line, covering nearly half a mile—a wonderful sight—a veritable sea of white helmets, galloping horses, gun carriages, etc., whizzing past and vanishing so soon in distant clouds of dust.

A number of invited guests and press representatives murmured their delight from time to time during the evening.

The Sedeg Feature Film Company announces that it is putting out several designs in one, two and three-sheet lithographs to accompany their state-right feature in two reels, entitled "Captain Scott's South Pole Expedition," which exceedingly timely production depicts the experiences of the intrepid British Antarctic explorer from the time he departed from Wellington, New Zealand, to the time he encamped at Cape Evans, across the great ice barrier of the South Frigid Zone. An eight-sheet poster of a wonderfully attractive appearance is also being put out together with several varieties of booklets and folders. In fact, the Sedeg Feature Film Company has left no stone unturned to present their latest film sensation in the cleanest manner possible. About one-quarter of the country was already sold at the time this item went to press.

One noticeable feature, a proof of its timely nature, was the use that the New York Herald made of several views of this film in its various editions during the week of April 1st to April 7th, inclusive, in conjunction with their stories upon hearing from Captain Scott, who, on January 3rd, was only 150 miles distant from the zealously sought goal.

REPRODUCTIONS OF POSTERS FOR CAPTAIN SCOTT'S SOUTH POLE EXPEDITION
In Two Reels by Sedeg Feature Film Company, Inc.

OF THE INTERESTING CAREER OF EDWARD E. PIDGEON

There is a peculiar value attaches itself to a man when he has made good as a press representative which makes him an indispensable adjunct to the cause, whatever it may be, for which his "boost" propensities are being utilized. He is the pair of wings upon which the talent of the star arises to the tower of fame; he is the propeller behind the big manufacturing concern, or the much-talked-of and prosperous theatrical company. He is the man, who, smearing on the color a little more deftly, with a little better blend, and a trifle more vividness than his adversary, attracts the entire train of pleasure loving humans to the box office of the concern which he represents.

Edward E. Pidgeon is one of the above-mentioned individuals upon whom fortune has smiled, lavishing the gift of "boostology" upon him to such an extent that he has become known in theatrical circles as one of the most valuable press representatives that this country has ever known.

Mr. Pidgeon, who is at present with the Kinemacolor Company of America, started life as a newspaper man. He was for several years well known in connection with the Brooklyn edition of the New York World. Afterward he became dramatic editor of the N. Y. Press, from whence he eventually emanated to the work in which he has been engaged so successfully since that time.

Many of the successful theatrical stars of to-day, especially those of foreign origin, owe their money-earning capacities in a very large measure to Mr. Edward E. Pidgeon. Many a star has changed the tune of a salary from a three to a four figure value, through the capable handling of affairs by this clever manipulator of press proceedings. It was from the big theatrical firm of Werba-Luescher that Mr. Pidgeon came to Kinemacolor. 'Tis said that he had tired of roving, and was desirous of the luxury of sitting still at an office desk for a while.

Among the stars so successfully handled by Mr. Pidgeon are, Harry Lauder, Maud Odell, Cecilia Loftus, Valeska Suratt, and others. Also that the name of Wm. Morris, the well-known vaudeville manager, became a household word is largely due to the efforts of Mr. Pidgeon.

It may be said of Mr. Pidgeon, and much to his credit, that although his career in the publicity field has been so successful where others were concerned, he has made no play for publicity for himself, and although he does not shut himself up in a glass case, an attempt to interview him is not always successful on account of his disinclination to talk about himself. His province has been to boost the other fellow, and like all successful press representatives he has concentrated on making the firm or individual for whose publicity he was responsible the central figure in the lime light.

The Pianist, Mr. Guy Oliver; the Cook, Miss Julia Stuart; the Banker, Mr. A. B. Francis; the Typist, Miss Muriel Ostrich; the Milliner, Mrs. M. Baring.
Moving Men, Milliners, Messengers, Grocers, Policemen and Others.

Signor Olivero, a famous Italian pianist, is moving into his new apartment, when he discovers a copy of "Alexander's Ragtime Band" which he immediately tries upon his piano as soon as the husky van-men push it into the room. The lilting ragtime melody is so pleasing to the professor that he becomes too engrossed to observe the antics of the workmen—who begin to swing to and fro with the rhythm of the song. They swing the articles of furniture as though they were dancing partners and finally the men pair off, and puffing away at their cob-pipes, they arouse the ire of the pianist, who orders them out of the room in high dugeon.

The musician's fingers stray back to the keys and the melody descends to a milliner's establishment directly beneath. There the pretty assistants begin to decorate the hats in ragtime, until they pair off and dance up the stairs into the musician's room. The magic strains filter then to the office below, where a dignified banker, his secretary and his stenographer are all enthralled, while a jolly darky porter is captured in the same way at the telephone in the hall. The cook in the kitchen and the grocer's little boy both drop dishes and vegetables to scramble upstairs to join the other tenants, who are all dancing about the enrapt pianist, under a hypnotic spell from the music. The furniture movers and a messenger boy perform mighty feats of daring to get to the pianist's room from the pavement below.

At the end of an hour the dancers are exhausted, and yielding to weakness, sink to the floor in a stupor. The pianist finally notices the catastrophe he has caused. In alarm he rushes down to the street and appeals for help to a policeman. The officer after chuckling over the trouble, advises him: "Since the ragtime has knocked out the dancers, surely a galop will revive them." The pianist returns to try this and as he plays at lightning speed, the people all revive and dash away on their own business at break-neck speed. Their capers as the powerful strains drive them to frenzied work show the funniest part of the whole incident in the climax.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By Tom Costello and James Girvan

Auxiliary Local 35, I. A. T. S. E.
Officers

John F. Stephens.....President
Sam Kaplan .....Vice-President
Gus Durkin .....Secretary-Treasurer
Joseph Basson .....Recording Secretary
Charles Morrato .....Sergeant-at-Arms
Henry Weinberger .....Business Agent
Edward Phelps .....Asst. Business Agent

The Auxiliary meets at Teutonia Hall, No. 66 Essex street, the 1st and 3d Monday of every month at 10 a. m. Dues can be paid to Brother Weinberger at the Union office, 133 Third avenue, or to Gus Durkin, care of Berkley Theatre, No. 19 West Forty-fourth street.

The regular meeting of the Auxiliary was held at the above hall Monday, April 1st, 1912, and was well attended. Vice Chairman Sam Kaplan presided in the absence of Brother Stephens. Business of great importance was brought before the body. Brother Henry Weinberger was elected Business Agent and Brother Ed. Phelps, Assistant. The initiation was raised to $10.00 and it will only be a short time before it reaches $25.00, so brother operators take the tip and get in on the second floor. The Business Agent's report was very gratifying; he placed a number of men the past two weeks, and has positions for a number more open for the ensuing week.

I received a letter from Brother Jesse Le Vine last week, from Cincinnati, Ohio, he said in his letter it was one of the strongest union towns he had the pleasure of playing in. There are 110 licenses issued in Cincinnati and the union has enrolled 100 men, leaving only 10 operators without union cards. "Ye Gods!" if every city could boast of such a strong showing we would have no more coops, but operating rooms that are fit for a human being to work in, and it is with pleasure the Moving Picture News prints the names of the officers of the M. P. M. O. Local Union No. 165, I. A. T. S. E.

The officers of the above union are as follows:

They hold their meetings at the Local T. M. A. Hall, 130-132 West Fifth street. Cincinnati is a growing city and on past performances I'm sure Local No. 165 will keep pace with its growth.

I had the extreme pleasure of meeting Mr. John Anderson, who managed Huber's Museum in Fourteenth street for 22 years, and it was his untiring work and his clever managerial ability that made it one of the most widely known amusement enterprises in the United States and made many millions for its owner, Mr. George Huber. I had the pleasure of working under his management for four years and it was a pleasure indeed, and as we talked of old times in the office of the Olympic Theatre, where he is holding down the financial department of Al Reeves' show for this week, he spoke with a catch in his voice and a tear-dimmed eye of the late Tony Pastor. Mr. Anderson is getting along in years but he is just as quick and active as he was when I first met him eight years ago, but the road work don't appeal to him; he is a firm believer in New York, and as he watched the moving picture business gain its foothold with the best enterprises in the land, it is only a prediction I heard him make eight years ago. Huber's Museum was one of the first places in the United States to have pictures as a regular feature and sixteen years ago a combination vaudeville and picture show was presented for admissions ranging from 10 to 25 cents.

It was with deep regret that I heard Brother Henry L. Kahn had to go to the Ray Brook Sanitarium in the Adirondack Mountains; he has a severe case of tuberculosis. The union extends its heartfelt sympathy and hope to see you back again in the near future.

Brother Harry J. Woodle, the hustling representative of Sirius Carbon Company, has been in the vicinity of Fourteenth street for the past four weeks explaining and demonstrating the good qualities of the Sirius carbons. Brother Woodle is an old timer in the electrical department of road productions and has handled all makes of carbons, but now he can convince the most skeptical that Sirius Company's product is superior to any on the market. The Sirius has been on the market for the past five years but it took Harry to get out and make the Sirius a by-word among moving picture operators. For forty labels from the package the operator can secure an order for a pair of $4.00 union-made shoes or a $2.00 union-made hat for twenty labels. Guess all the boys will be sporting Regal shoes and fancy headgear!

Many thanks Brother Phelps for your kind letter. James and I are always glad to hear from brother members of the Auxiliary.

Accept our congratulations on being made assistant delegate.

The two accompanying photographs were taken at the Unique Theatre, East Fourteenth street, showing the entrance as Tom Costello, the editor of the Operators' Chat column, was busy getting subscriptions for the Moving Picture News.

The second picture shows the switchboard in the operating-room and Brother Mike Bernard, the chief operator, his brother, Morris, and his assistant, Joe Lidde, who is house electrician. The outfit consists of two Powers No. 6 machines, a spotlight and a double dissolving stereopticon. The projection at this house is a credit to the Operators, and as Manager Flanagan has nothing but first run Independent film and the best vaudeville obtainable, and the S. P. O. sign is conclusive proof that the public agree with him, and the clink of the ten cent pieces speaks louder than words.

Mr. T. W. Williams, formerly owner and manager of Idle Hour Park, Far Rockaway, has formed a company for buying and building airdomes throughout the state. Mr. Williams is a pioneer in the moving picture field. His park at Far Rockaway was conceded to be one of the largest and best equipped parks devoted to picture-plays, and his new enterprises will be the best that money, coupled with long experience, can secure. He has already signed contracts for three large theatres to be devoted to pictures and vaudeville in New York State for the coming theatrical season. He can always be found at his office, 50 Union Square.

One afternoon last week I chanced to drop in to the pretty little Washington Theatre on One Hundred and Forty-fifth street, corner of Broadway, and I saw something very unusual in the way of showing pictures; two sheets being used instead of one, the first one being used in the ordinary way while the other was set to the left. The operator (Brother Fred. McDonald) said the idea was to relieve the strain on the eyes and body. Brother McDonald has been with the Barron Amusement Company six years altogether, four years at the Washington. He tells me that he makes his own coating for the screens.

Brother operators of the N. A. C. O. in England, Scotland and Ireland, let us hear how you are getting along over there. Meet us and let us talk things over in the Chat Column.

Canadian operators get busy. I am waiting to hear what you have to say about projection in the "Land of the Maple." I have only heard from five boys so far and I know that there are more than five operators that write, so once more I say, get busy!

Last Wednesday I accepted an invitation to visit the Grand Theatre, 796 Tremont avenue, Bronx, just to see what kind of a place it was, and I must say I was surprised to see such an elegant little photo-play house so far away from Fourteenth street. The proprietor, Mr. Charles Goldreyer, is to be complimented on having such a beautiful place. Mr. Albert Goldreyer, the manager, says there is no place in New York that can beat it, and I must say that I agree with him as he has taken the greatest care to make it as near perfection as possible by putting in an equipment that is par excellent, a Standard machine, No. 4, with motor and Hallberg economizer. I must say that Mr. Goldreyer has started about this in the right way by putting in an operating room big enough for the operator to turn around in, the size of it is 15 feet high, 14 feet wide and 7 feet deep, with a large skylight in the roof for good ventilation. The theatre is very prettily lighted with six large French cut glass chandeliers, 360-watt Tungsten lamps to each chandelier. Brother Dave Chaney handles the projection end to the satisfaction of everybody and he gets the credit for it too.

Well, "Pictures," I must say I was greatly pleased to receive your letter, also very glad to hear that you are so much interested in your work that you can find time to make improvements. We will be only too glad to use any diagrams you may care to send us. Also any time you have any article of interest to brother operators send it right in to the Chat Column. You would also oblige me greatly by sending me a picture of your operating room and yourself as soon as convenient. If there are any other operators near you see if you can get them interested in the column, you know the "more the merrier." We can take care of them all. Hope you have your exhaust fan running by this time. Seems to me it would require a refrigerating plant to bring the temperature down so you could breathe without burning your nose.

OUR LONDON LETTER

London, March 18th.

The shadow of a trust, large and ominous, grows more distinct week by week in English trade circles. To many it has come rather as a surprise, and at present uncertainty and unpleasant forebodings lie in the heart of many connected with the business on this side. At the moment the combine movement is being exploited by American and English firms alike. This change, as you must well know, Friend Saunders, has sounded a warning call to those engaged in the journalistic side of the business.

The proprietor of the trade journal begins to realize the imminent danger of his advertisement revenue becoming sadly depleted. This, indeed, will be the case. In the near future "copy" will be only forthcoming from the man who has been fortunate enough to secure "exclusive rights," and not from the producer also, as has hitherto obtained. Selig's masterpiece "Christopher Columbus" has been handled in this way, the "rights" being vested with the New Century Film Service, Ltd. The English producer also is guilty of the practice.

The Clarendon Company has lately produced a subject which has set England talking, and speculating as to whether, after all, the old country is very far behind their foreign cousins in the matter of production. Certainly "Eulalie" strikes a new note in the English market; it is by far the finest drama I have seen turned out by the Britisher. The New Century Company are placing this also.

The Durbar pictures at The Scala continue to draw a distinguished patronage to the Scala Kinemacolor Theater, and this healthy condition of things has every indication of a long reign. The pictures most certainly merit it, as you will agree when Mr. Urban leaves you to enjoy the fruits of his Indian tour.

The trade has suffered a loss just recently by the death of one of its representative organs, the Picture Theatre News. Concerning this I could say a good deal, as my hand has guided it through a turbulent sea since its inception almost until its death. Change of proprietorship certainly worked no good. Deficient circulation resulted in dissatisfied advertisers, which, of course, always proves fatal. The Bioscope and Kinematograph still enjoy a deservedly extensive support; others have recently been supplemented by a contemporary, The Cinema, which is at present too young to pass criticism upon.

I notice Mr. Harry Furniss is visiting your city for the purpose of visiting Mr. Edison to discuss with him on the subject of film production. To his many literary activities Mr. Furniss has now added the writing of comedies for the silent stage. His work as an illustrator of Dickens, has been much admired by Mr. Edison, under whose direction several films based on Dickens' novels have been produced recently. "These pictures will be all my own," said Mr. Furniss prior to his departure for your side. "I have written them, 'dressed' them, and am now going over to the States to rehearse and produce them for Mr. Edison. At the same time I am going to look into a wonderful invention of Mr. Edison's which promises to revolutionize animated photography as an educational asset."

The popular actor of the British and Colonial Film Company—"Lieutenant Daring"—has recently had a remarkable escape from death while taking part in a picture-play at Brighton. The subject being filmed showed an attack by Spanish brigands, the leader of the gang striking the Lieutenant, and in the struggle which followed the officer was thrown over the cliff. For this purpose a plank was placed just below the edge of the cliff for the actor to stand upon in order to get out of "range" of the camera.

While disappearing, however, he slipped on the grass and fell 90 feet into the sea. Other members of the company climbed down the slope, and with the assistance of the coast guards, who procured a boat, Daring was rescued. The interpid Lieutenant informs me that he now feels none the worse for his exciting experience, and only sustained a sprained wrist. Picture acting is evidently not all honey.

The question has arisen in trade circles: "Will the coal strike—which at this moment is crippling the country—affect the film industry?" From all accounts this does not, up to the present, anyhow, appear to be the case. Excellent reports come from the managers of theatres who are happily located in the mining districts—but they are not the quarters which are likely to feel the pinch.

The Biograph says: "It is all very well for the picture theatres to be doing good business now, at the commencement of the strike; but what will happen when money runs short and good faith gets dear? Then, most likely, the picture theatres and all other places of amusement will be empty and many thousands of pounds will be "dropped down the slot."

In conclusion, I hear that the War Office is inclined to be sympathetic towards the suggestion made recently that the Cinematograph whould be urged as an aid to recruiting, by giving facilities to operators to take moving pictures of the everyday life of the soldiers.

LEONARD DONALDSON.

Daily Consular and Trade Reports of Moving Pictures Abroad

[From Vice Consul Charles J. Wright, Barmen.]

Moving Pictures in Westphalia

There is scarcely a town of any size in this consular district which has not one or more theaters devoted to the exhibition of moving pictures, some of which excel the other local theaters in capacity, as well as in decorations and comfort. The programs generally last for 2 to 2½ hours and then repeat, the prices ranging from 20 pfennigs to 1.50 marks (7 to 35 cents), children and soldiers or sailors in uniform being admitted for half price. Each ticket is subject to a tax of 10 per cent, as are all theater tickets in Germany.

There are 4 cities of over 200,000 population, 5 of over 100,000, and 11 of over 35,000 in this consular district. In Barmen there are 10 moving picture theaters, 7 in Elberfeld, 4 in Duisberg, and 1 in Dusseldorf. The figures for the other cities were not obtainable.

All theaters are subject to strict building regulations, and the operators are placed in fireproof compartments. Most of the theaters have orchestras and some have reciters, who explain the picture as it is thrown on the screen. Programs are generally free, but are sometimes sold at 2 cents. Films are rented from central exchanges, the rates being usually 10 cents per meter for "first-run" films, 8 cents for "second-run," and so on as the film loses popularity.

Most of the films shown here are French; Italian coming second, and American third. Many American films are exhibited here, "Wild West" and "Civil War" pictures meeting with much favor. One or two American film firms have agents here, but the country is not as well exploited as it should be. At present dramas of two or three acts seem to be the most favored. There are several firms in this district manufacturing films. The import duty on moving picture films is 2 marks (48 cents) per kilo (2.2 pounds).

[From Consul Ralph C. Busser, Erfurt.]

Admission Prices—Educational Use

The popularity of moving picture shows in this district continues undiminished. The price of admission ranges from 20 pfennigs (5 cents) to 1 mark (24 cents). Orchestrions and other forms of mechanically rendered music were formerly the vogue, but they have now mostly been displaced by improvisations on the ordinary piano.

The historical, landscape, agricultural, industrial, and other educational scenes are either explained by a lecturer or by a written description. In this manner the tone of the cinematograph theaters in this region is being elevated. Many school teachers encourage their pupils to attend, and people of refinement patronize the better class of such theaters.

Where and How Equipment Is Obtained

The moving picture machines or apparatus used in the local theaters are of German manufacture, those made by a firm in Dresden having the highest reputation here for noiseless operation and all-around serviceability. Local managers seem satisfied with the apparatus already installed and consider that American machines, because of the expense of transportation and tariff, would cost too much for successful sale here and elsewhere in the interior of Germany. The German machines can be bought on easy terms.

The films are rented from various agencies in Berlin and elsewhere, which procure them from the manufacturers in Europe and the United States. Frequently several theaters in the same vicinity, if they do not already belong to the same syndicate, will enter into a joint arrangement for the lease of films, which they exchange among themselves. Usually the higher-priced theaters have what is known as a monopoly arrangement with the film-supply agencies by which they are entitled to receive films for exhibition before the other theaters in the same town. Films which carry with them such a monopoly privilege rent at the rate of 29 to 36 cents per running meter (3.28 feet) per week. Films without monopoly privileges rent at 10 to 15 cents per running meter per week.

Police Regulations—American Films

In manufacturing machines and packing films for the German market careful consideration should be given to the customary police regulations concerning the construction and preparation of the moving picture equipment for the purpose of avoiding fires. The principal requirements may be briefly stated as follows:

"The apparatus must be fitted with an automatically sliding metal sheet designed to extinguish the heat and light rays immediately upon the withdrawal of the film. The portion of the film which is in front of the lens (also in the window or opening of the apparatus) must move in a closed compartment of glass.

"The film shall never be placed directly over or moved around the lamp box, and must be so arranged that it can by no chance come in contact with the lighting contrivance. It must be unrolled from a metal container, hermetically closed except for the tiny opening out of which it comes, and wound into another similar metal case. These cases must be undetachably fastened to the 'stift' or pivot. The opening in the holder from which the film strips are unrolled must be so narrow as to render impossible the entrance of the flame."

The German market for American films promises to be better than ever, as there is a demand for landscape, historical, industrial, and other educational views. Scenes of cowboy and Indian life are always keenly appreciated; also American humorous sketches, if the humor is not too subtle or provincial. Sketches portraying the life at Atlantic City and Coney Island have found favor here.

American manufacturers in planning their pictures should remember both the police censorship and the marked improvement in the taste of the German showgoing public. Some such subjects as the following would be likely to be well received here: Scenes from American history; negro life in the South, especially on the cotton, sugar-cane, and fruit plantations; the county fairs and traveling circuses; the parades and other exciting scenes of an American political campaign; popular outdoor games and sports; student life at the great American universities; scenes from the cosmopolitan life of New York City, New York Harbor, and along the Hudson; the natural wonders of Colorado and the Yellowstone Park, and other aspects of picturesque America; hunting experiences in the great game country of the West, and illustrations of the various phases and processes of typical American industries—mining, agricultural, manufacturing, etc.

[From Consul Alfred W. Donegan, Magdeburg.]

General Use of Moving Pictures

Moving pictures are used in Magdeburg in 16 moving picture theaters and the largest vaudeville house, and to illustrate lectures on travel, science, and medicine. Prices at the regular establishments range from 6 to 29 cents. One theater is connected with an attractive café and restaurant and gives daily concerts afternoon and evening.

The usual program consists of 6 to 10 pictures, with a total of 4,900 to 6,550 feet of film, and lasts from one and one-half to two hours. The average length of the films is about 650 feet, but a program occasionally contains one long picture of 2,600 to 4,000 feet, supplemented by a few short pictures. The pictures are generally dramas of two to four acts, written especially for the cinematograph stage and presented by well-known theatrical stars, who are either engaged exclusively at fixed annual salaries or for a stated compensation for special pictures. A German company recently paid a well-known French actress $3,570 for her services in three dramatic pictures. Certain other popular cinematograph stars, in the regular employ of the leading European companies, are said to be receiving annual salaries of 100,000 francs ($19,300).

American Pictures Popular—Method of Distribution

Pictures of American manufacture are now being shown in every program, the American dramatic picture being especially popular. The managers also praise the excellence of the American film from the technical standpoint.

Films are bought up by general distributing agencies in Berlin and other large cities in Germany at a cost of 23.8 cents per meter (3.28 feet) for plain films and from 31 to 36 cents per meter for colored films. They are then arranged into sets of one program each and rented as such to the various theaters throughout the Empire. The usual rent charged for the first week is 5.9 cents per meter and each succeeding week the rent becomes cheaper. Frequently the films, when old and nearly worn out, are sold for 1 or 2 cents per meter.

Until recently there seems to have been no effort to introduce American machines. There is no prejudice in this district against American cinematographic products of any description, and it would seem that a demand for American machines might be created if they are able to compete with the local article. The average price paid for the machines in the larger theaters here is about $333; one theater paid $428 for its machine.

The police must inspect each list of films before they are produced. Except at special children's performances, children under 16 are not admitted to the shows unless accompanied by parents or guardians, or persons explicitly authorized by them; no children are allowed to attend after 9 o'clock at night.

[From Consul Robert J. Thompson, Hanover.]

German Machines Used

Moving picture machines used here are almost exclusively of two German makes, prices ranging from $120 to $215. About half the theaters in the city of Hanover are "first-week" houses; that is, they rent only new films. American films, especially scenes from Western life, are popular, though regarded as of poorer quality than the French. The police censorship is exercised not only against immoral pictures, but against those containing improprieties of which a foreigner is often ignorant. For instance, a film was recently rejected because it showed a policeman being overthrown by a crowd. The price of the standard film of German make is 20 to 29 cents per meter (3.28 feet).

HER INDIAN HERO

Nestor

"Her Indian Hero," the Nestor release of Wednesday, April 17th, surely and safely ascends to the very pinnacle of Mount Success. We have never yet seen anything to equal this stupendous Nestor production with its gripping, tense plot, its beautiful setting, its perfect staging, its impeccable acting, its marvelous photography and its general excellence. Some of the scenes are so entrancing and the tinting and toning so artistic as to remain graven on one's mind.

The story deals with Veda Mead, a white girl, who visits the West accompanied by her father and her fiancé, Hal Benton. Here she meets a tribe of Indians and is much attracted by Silver Water, the civilized son of Chief White Moon. Her coquettish ways completely enslave the young Indian, who forgets Morning Star, his intended bride, and lays siege to Veda's heart. The white girl writes "To my Indian Hero" on her calling card, gives it to him and mischievously asks him to visit her in the East.

Months pass and Miss Mead is about to become Mrs. Benton. A card bearing Silver Water's name greatly terrifies Veda, inasmuch as she has indulged in reading books on Indians and their customs. She fears Silver Water and staggers out on the veranda to inhale the night air and think some way out of her predicament. Suddenly the Indian appears in full war-paint and forces her to go with him. Veda manages to scream and Benton comes to her aid. The men fight for the girl and the victor, Silver Water, takes Veda to the Indian camp, where Morning Star, the neglected maid, knife in hand, determines to have her revenge. A mighty convulsion and Veda awakens to find herself safe in Benton's arms. There stands Silver Water, fashionably dressed in correct evening attire. Veda recoils from him and the Indian quickly comprehends the futility of his love. He silently departs, destroys her card and returns to Morning Star and the blanket.

The scenario is from the fertile pen of Alexandra Phillips, the director is Milton H. Fahrney and the best acting is done by George Gebhart as Silver Water, Dorothy Davenport as Veda Mead, Jack Conway as Hal Benton, Russell Bassett as the old Indian Chief, Victoria Forde as Morning Star and Eugenia Forde as the Squaw.

"RESCUED BY WIRELESS"
Imp Release, April 15

When Grace Langdon undertook her trip of mingled adventure and pleasure to Mexico, she was unaware of the dangers that break out sporadically in that disturbed land. She was not a student of the newspapers, and did not know that Mexico lived on revolutions.

She and her party, however, had not been among the dons long before there was trouble between the Mexicans and the few Americans there. The situation was complicated by the fact that the chief of the Mexican revolutionaries fell in love with Grace. The U. S. Consul was a friend of the girl's, and sought to obtain outside assistance by telegraph. In this he was frustrated by the revolutionary leader, who shot him in the leg as he was operating the telegraph wires.

The result was that Grace and her friends were captured by the revolutionaries and taken aboard a Mexican gunboat. But Grace had not neglected her fiancé in San Francisco; she had wired to him. So down came the gallant fellow with all speed, and, as luck would have it, his yacht arrived in the disturbed waters just when the plight of Grace and her friends was at its darkest. By the aid of wireless telegraphy, her fiancé was enabled to communicate with the U. S. S. Ohio, and make known the dangers in which the party of American citizens were placed by the threatening Mexicans.

The Ohio's men thereupon got busy, and after putting the Mexican rebels to rout, released the prisoners and incidentally hastened the happy marriage of Grace Langdon and her lover.

The picture abounds in thrilling scenes of Mexican revolutionary life on land and sea, and includes some very fine views of life on the United States warship.

'WOMAN ALWAYS PAYS
Imp Release, April 18

This story affords the renowned European actress, Asta Nielsen, an opportunity of displaying her wonderful ability as a great artiste.

It depicts the life of a young woman, who, tiring of her husband and her life in attractive surroundings, conceives a sudden admiration for a picturesque circus man. He also is attracted by her, and when he appears and demands that she cast in her lot with the circus folks, she yields, and leaves her beautiful home for the wandering life of a circus.

Under the tuition of her admirer, she becomes a gifted member of the "haute ecole." The new life fascinates her; it was so unconventional and exciting. Months pass, and, alas, she becomes disillusioned, for her hero, Rudolph, proves fickle; he transfers his affections to another girl of the circus. There is a quarrel between the two women and Asta and Rudolph are discharged.

Down they sink in the social scale; he becomes a dissolute ne'er-do-well; and she the pianist at a popular beer garden.

Her husband, during these months, has never ceased to care for Asta, and in a chance meeting persuades her to return to home and duty. She consents, and while in the act of leaving Rudolph appears, and, exerting the old power over her; she remains with him.

Still the husband is undaunted, and makes yet another effort to regain his wife, but Rodolph refuses to give her up. This time, the man and woman quarrel; and in the struggle which follows, Asta stabs him to death. She is arrested, and taken away to prison, while her helpless husband looks on.

The scenes are all laid in Europe; the settings are exceedingly beautiful, and the acting is of the highest dramatic nature. This is the first picture shown in America in which Asta Nielsen, the gifted Danish actress, will be seen.

LONESOME MISS WIGGS
Imp Release, April 20

Krautzmeyer is a respectable German widower, who finds himself temporarily but seriously embarrassed. Just before leaving his office for the day, he receives word from a firm of attorneys that unless a sum of $5,000—long overdue—is paid within forty-eight hours, they will attach his property. In despair, the little German wends his way homeward, where he is greeted by his mother-in-law and his two children.

While looking over an evening paper, he comes across an advertisement wherein a young and beautiful lady advertises for a husband, stating that the lucky man is to receive a gift of $5,000 from her on the day of the wedding. Krautzmeyer sees his chance, and decides to pose as a French Count. The lady sends him her photograph, and he is in ecstasy over her beauty.

While on his way to meet his wife-to-be, he is waylaid by three tramps, who discover his plans, and one is appointed to impersonate Krautzmeyer. The tramp, now disguised as a French count, starts out to woo the lady, but, arriving at her residence, is horror-stricken at sight of the homely woman who is awaiting her fiancé. He beats a hasty retreat, and allows Krautzmeyer to carry out his original plans, without telling him of his discovery.

Krautzmeyer's mother-in-law, meanwhile, suspects the cause of his absence, and finds the newspaper clipping which tells of his plan. She follows him, and arrives just as Krautzmeyer meets Miss Wiggs. He, too, is appalled by her appearance, and tries to retreat, but is stopped by the tramps, who are on the scene. Miss Wiggs has given the German the $5,000, which the tramps stole, and when the mother-in-law demands that he leave with her, Miss Wiggs demands her money. How Krautzmeyer gets out of this predicament is convincingly revealed at the finale of the picture.

On the same reel:

SCENIC WONDERS OF YELLOWSTONE PARK'

The United States is fortunate in having the best-preserved natural park in the world, and the citizens of the country are properly proud of it. Yellowstone Park is visited, not only by American citizens, but by tourists from all over the world, who admire it for its great attractions. In that park is seen the rare spectacle of the geysers in active operation. The animal kingdom is well represented by bears and other specimens of feræ natura. The scenery is very diversified, including all sorts of vegetation and natural formations.

This picture gives a very good idea of the scenic wonders of this beautiful park, which brings home to the minds of those persons who have never visited it the extreme desirability of making themselves acquainted with a resort provided for them by the enterprise of the United States Government.

The picture is to be divided into four releases, sent out at intervals of a few weeks. One picture will deal with the wonderful warefalls of the park; another picture will show the well-known geysers and hot springs in actual operation; the third picture will deal with the bears, cormorants, and other members of the brute creation in the great park; the fourth picture will be devoted to the scenic grandeurs of the park. Thus, the moving picture patrons will be taken over the park, as it were, by a series of easy stages.

The photography of this picture is exceptionally fine. The film is pictorially fine, while the photographic technique of the film is also perfect. The film, in fact, gives a faultless presentation of one of nature's masterpieces.

'THE BABY BRIDE
Thanhouser Release, April 16

He was the only son of a pretty young widow. Perhaps she spoiled him, but anyway she loved him dearly, for although he was under seven years old, he had many cute, quaint ways, and heartily returned the affection of his mamma.

Their next-door neighbor was a man the boy did not approve of. He was not married, for one thing; there were no little children in his house to play with. Besides, when he met mamma, he never had time to talk to her son. Really, be was in love with the pretty young widow, but was too bashful to say so.

Then, one day, a new interest came into the boy's life. A beautiful maiden, she was three years old. moved into the house next door. She was the niece of the man, and had been left to him when his brother died. The man, however, did not know much about children, and left the girl in the care of a cross old housekeeper, who did not appreciate her. It made the boy's blood boil, for he failed to understand why any one could be anything but sweet to her. One of his few sorrows was that he did not have a little sister to play with, guide and protect, and he soon knew that the little girl next door was the very one he would have chosen had the stork deigned to consult him.

Matters finally came to a climax. He saw the wicked housekeeper brutally and fiendishly scold the wonderful creature, and he decided that something must be done, so he firmly took her away, silencing the housekeeper's objections with missiles, led the baby to his home, and told his mother that now he had a little sister.

His grief was profound when the child was taken away from him, and he could not understand why this was done, even when his mother explained to him that they had "no legal right" to the child. He did not comprehend what legal rights were, but later he learned, when he glanced at a newspaper and saw that the "legal rights" of a father were secondary to the legal rights of a husband.

Naturally, there was only one thing to do —elope—and he did it. The baby did not object; she liked the boy, and anytbing he said was law in her eyes. So she obediently took her bonnet, trotted to a window, permitted him to help her out stealthily, and hand in hand they wandered along to a convenient parsonage.

The minister listened to their troubles; he was a kindly man; then bade them wait until he could secure the necessary witnesses. Instead, he telephoned the mother, and she and the baby's uncle hastened to the parsonage.

The boy explained that he was marrying the baby, to provide against her being neglected and ill-treated, and declared tbat he would defend his "legal rights." The uncle, really a good sort, but, like most unmarried men, helpless when it came to a matter of caring for children, saw a way out of the difficulty. He told the boy that he could have the guardianship of the baby if—and then he looked at the pretty widow inquiringly. She blushed and hesitated—then—— Well, there was a wedding that afternoon, after all, and the baby was never neglected again.

INTO THE DESERT

Thanhouser Release, April 19

An American girl and her father were traveling in the Orient, and there they were joined by the girl's fiancé. He knew the dangers of the country of old, but the girl laughed at his warnings, and believed that life and property were as safe as tbey are on Broadway, New York. The girl hired a dragoman, and took an excursion into the desert, despite her sweetheart's most emphatic warning.

It does not pay to disregard the advice of the well-informed, as tbe girl soon found, to her cost, for the treacherous guide led her into tbe midst of a band of Arabs. The chief of the clan had seen the girl roaming about the bazars, and had ordered the dragoman to lure her to his camp. After sbe had been made a prisoner, the chief sent a demand for a heavy ransom to her father.

The father was willing to pay, but the fiancé, declaring the elder man was too feeble to make the journey, won his consent to be the messenger to the desert. The Arab chief met him at the appointed place, but treacherously refused to return the girl after receiving the money. A fight followed, and the white man was left for dead on the desert sands.

Where love failed, jealousy won. The Arab's favorite wife had been detailed as guard over the American girl, and believed that her sway was disputed. Therefore, she willingly listened to the girl's plea for freedom, guided her from the camp, and gave her a horse.

On her way across the desert, the girl met her American sweetheart, wounded, but still determined not to return without her. The two rode away together, were pursued, and the American had the grim satisfaction of evening scores with the Arab who had dared to cast his eyes on a woman who was far superior to him.

SAVED BY A CAT
Solax Release, April 17

Mr. Lewis, a wealthy merchant, is betrayed by one of his clerks, a member of a gang of hold-up men. The merchant is held up on his way to close a big business deal. He has with him considerable cash. When he almost reaches his destination, the gang attacks him, dopes him, and takes him to a tunnel, where, after they relieve him of his money, he is left until he comes to himself.

When Mr. Lewis gets back to his office he calls in the services of Detective Harper, who, after a thorough investigation, finds a clue which leads him to suspect the clerk. After close watching, he shadows the clerk to the den of the criminals. The clerk, however, is on his guard, and, knowing that he is under surveillance, encourages the detective to enter the den of the criminals. Here, Harper is trapped. He eventually finds himself in a room closed in by automatic doors. The only outlet is a small grated window near the ceiling of the room. On the sill of this window, the detective finds a cat. Anticipating trouble, Harper scribbles a note, and ties it to the collar of the cat. Soon the cat leaves, and the window automatically closes air-tight. After a space, Harper begins struggling, desperately trying to fight off asphyxiation. Presently. he is overcome by the fumes of the gases with which the gang had filled his room.

In the meanwhile the cat strays back to her home. Her old maid mistress sees the note around her neck, and brings the police to the rescue of the detective, who is found almost dead.

This is a remarkable story, full of sensational situations, and remarkable light effects.

BILLY, THE DETECTIVE
Solax Release, April 19

Billy is anxious to be a detective. He buys a book, "How To Become a Detective," and studies the theories of detecting crime most assiduously. So, when he finds the diary belonging to Dora Burns, and sees an entry that she, Dora, is going to buy a revolver for defending herself against burglars, and a hatchet for killing Edward, Billy sees an opportunity of putting into operation the methods he had learned. He shadows Dora to her home, and prowls around most mysteriously and in the most approved detective-like fashion. Dora Burns discovers him, however, and forcibly convinces him that he should skidoo.

Billy is persistent. He will not be thwarted. His head is swelled with the awful crime Dora is about to commit, and so he runs to get the police. The police arrive, and ask Dora for an explanation—for they find blood spots on her apron, and on her brother's coat. Dora takes the police to the kitchen and shows the police a bleeding rooster.

Billy's career as a detective ends then and there.

THE TORN LETTER
Nestor Release, April 8

John Arnold is a fugitive from justice, charged with a crime of which he is innocent. One night he pays a visit to his home town and sends a note to his sister to meet him at an appointed place. In her excitement, Mabel tears the note in two, one-half of which falls to the floor as she hides the portions in her dress. Throwing a shawl over her head, she hurries from the house to meet her brother. Scott, Mabel's husband, is of a very jealous nature. Returning home in the absence of his wife, he finds the part of the note which Mabel had dropped, reads it, and believes his wife guilty of being untrue to him. On returning, Mabel is confronted by her husband, who demands that she tell him the name of her lover. In order to shield her brother, Mabel refuses to talk. Scott goes to his room, packs suitcase and disappears.

The following morning Mabel finds a letter from Scott, saying he has drowned himself. A searching party, on dragging the river for his body, come across Scott's hat and coat (which he had purposely placed there) and all believe him dead.

Two years later—Mabel, having to look around for a means of livelihood, becomes governess to the six-year-old child of Doctor Robert Ford, a widower. The child loves Mabel at once—the Doctor later. He gains her consent to lead her to the altar. In the meantime, Scott and the fugitive brother have met in the mines, in the Colorado mountains, and, neither knowing the history of the other, by an inscrutable degree of fate, they become partners and close friends. Both remain in ignorance of each other's past life, so silent are both concerning what has gone before, each trying to forget. Mabel, having learned at last of her brother's whereabouts, writes to tell him of her husband's (Scott's) jealousy and suicide, enclosing in the same letter the other half of the letter which had caused so much pain. Scott, upon seeing the handwriting and postmark upon the envelope, believes John to be the lover of his wife and he endeavors to get John's gun with which to shoot the supposed-to-be destroyer of his home. After a severe struggle, Scott is subdued and explanations follow. Scott compares the half of the letter he has always carried, since discovering what he thought his wife's perfidy, and finding the words and indentures complete, is broken in spirit, and in penitence starts for the East, a race with time, to repair the ruin his jealousy has wrought. Heart failure, which he has contracted through his passion and brooding during the interim, prevents him making great speed, and so he arrives upon the day of the wedding of Mabel to the Doctor. He witnesses the ceremony through the window and attempts to ascend the steps leading to the house, but the shock has aggravated his complaint and he passes away upon the doorstep of the man who has just claimed Mabel for his wife. She, in happy ignorance of the death of the man outside, sees happiness again in store for her.

THE RENEGADE
Nestor Release, April 10th.

Frank, an outlaw, has a sick wife, Mary. Frank threatens to strike his wife because she is not able to work for him. Dr. Gilbert, who pities his patient, tries to reason with her husband when the sheriff enters and arrests Frank. He is taken to prison and later attempts to escape. He is pursued by the guards. They follow him to the river bank where the outlaw, seeing escape in any other way impossible, dives into the water. His pursuers fire at him while he is in the water and as they do not see him reappear, believe they have killed him and notify his wife to that effect. However, he safely reaches the opposite shore and leaves the country.

The doctor has learned to love his unhappy patient and gains her consent to marry her. The happy couple, together with Mary's sister, who has always made her home with her, move to another home.

Frank, having heard of her marriage, comes to demand money of her. Waiting until the doctor has departed, he enters the house and confronts his wife, demanding a wallet of money that she is putting in a drawer. Her sister, in the meantime, slips out unobserved by Frank and goes for help. Just as the renegade husband has forcibly taken the money from his wife, the doctor returns for his medicine case, which he had forgotten while bidding adieu to his wife. He is surprised to find his wife's bedroom door locked and to discover the strange hat on the table. He commands his wife to open the door. Frank, in the meantime, covers her with his gun as he starts for the window. The doctor, from the other side of the door, draws his gun and again commands Mary to open the door. By this time Frank has forced Mary to stand between himself and the door. As he jumps out of the window, he fires, barely missing the doctor, who returns the fire. Fortunately, Mary, who has gotten to the door to open it, faints just before the doctor fires. She revives and explains the situation to the doctor, who hastens out to follow Frank. Just then, the sheriff and his men, whom the sister has notified, appear. They begin the pursuit of Frank and after wounding him severely, capture him and return to the doctor's house. Dr. Gilbert, together with Dr. Wilson, extract the bullet which wounded him and all is done for him that medical skill could accomplish. All in vain, however, as he dies and leaves Mary free to once more enter upon a happily married life with the doctor.

Mrs. Brooks, a widow, has spent all her money in sending her son, Paul, to college and keeping up their splendid home in the West. She feels that it is now imperative that either Paul or her daughter, Hazel, marry wealth. She writes her son the following letter:

"Dear Son:—

"Colonel Anderson is visiting in the neighborhood. He has a charming daughter whom I hope some day will be your wife. Spend your vacation at home and bring your chum with you. He will make an excellent 'catch' for your sister.

"Your loving Mother."

Col. Anderson's daughter, Helen, is an heiress. Paul's chum, Van Allen, is also very wealthy. Paul is annoyed at his mother's scheming, but Van Allen is only amused when by accident he sees the letter. He insists upon Paul replying to her letter and saying that they will start West at once. They arrive and are met by Paul's cowboy friends. In the meanwhile, the widow's daughter has flatly refused to marry Van Allen and the Colonel's daughter is just as determined to refuse to marry Paul. The two girls quarrel over the situation and Helen, refusing to ride with the Western girl, goes off driving by herself, only to have the horse run away. Paul, on his way home from the station, sees the runaway and dashes to the rescue and the two young people are not at all displeased with each other until they arrive at the Brooks' home and Helen becomes aware of the identity of her rescuer.

The next day the Colonel and the widow try to effect a reconciliation between the four young people, without avail. However, Van Allen has an idea which, after coaxing, the young people agree to follow. This is to try and marry the Colonel and the widow, which will leave the young people free to do as they wish. The boys tell the Colonel that the widow just adores him, while the girls confide to the widow that the Colonel worships her. The widow is flattered and greatly pleased. The Colonel decides she is the one woman in the world for him. He proposes and is accepted, greatly to the joy of the young people. Later, the Colonel and widow are to be married, but now that no one cares whether they marry or not, the four young people suddenly decide that they were made for each other and the Colonel and the widow are delighted that their match-making has not been in vain and that wedding bells will ring for six instead of for two.

ETHEL'S SACRIFICE
Powers Release, April 20

Chester Long and Philip Marsden are close friends in college, until Philip graduates, he being in a higher class. A year later Chester is forced to resign his college career in order to support his widowed mother. He, however, is unable to find employment until he meets Philip, who, knowing his ability in running a car, recommends him for the position of a chauffeur with the family of his fiance, Rose Warren. Now, Rose has a sister Ethel, who admires Chester the moment she sees him and he falls desperately in love with her.

The four young folks naturally see a great deal of each other, with the result that Philip and Rose have a big wedding and on the same night Ethel and Chester elope. Mr. Warren, Ethel's father, disowns her and forbids anyone mentioning her name. The relations between the young couples, however, remain unbroken and if anything trouble binds the sisters closer together.

Two years later both couples have children born to them. Ethel and her baby are well and strong, but Rose's baby dies at birth and Rose herself lies at the point of death, calling for her dead baby. The doctor tells Philip that unless a substitute baby is procured, Rose will die.

Then it is that Ethel, learning of her sister's condition, offers her baby as a substitute. After the child has been taken to Rose, Ethel passes the house daily in order to obtain a view of the little one through the window. One day as she reaches the house, she sees crepe on the door—Rose is dead. The consequent sorrow softens the heart of Ethel's father and when he learns the identity of the baby, whose presence prolonged the life of Rose, he once more takes Ethel to his arms and welcomes her husband to his home.

THE BURGLAR'S REFORMATION
Reliance Release, April 24

Harold Graves is in love with Myrtle Wisner but Myrtle is wrapped up in her slum work and has an idea that Harold is too much of a "son of the idle rich" to please her strict ideas. She writes him a note against her father's wishes informing him that when he can show her that he has helped some one else than himself—been just a little unselfish—she will consider his suit. The night he gets the letter a burglar enters his room and tries to hold him up. Realizing that his chance to do a little good work has arrived, he prevails upon the burglar to give himself over to his way of thinking. He dresses him up as a gentleman and gives him plenty of money. Later he gives him work in his office where he is compelled to handle large sums of money. The burglar at first is obsessed with the temptation to steal the money that is in his hands. He conquers, and the man is pleased. He tempts him at home by leaving a large sum of money in his desk and leaving the burglar at home alone that night. Upon his return he finds the burglar still there and the money intact although in the meantime the burglar had taken the money out, pocketed it and walked as far as the door. The next day he takes him to see his sweetheart and explained to her and her father all about the burglar's seeming reformation. The father laughs at such a presentment, but the girl believes in its ultimate success. The father and his son quarrel over the question of money before the prospective son-in-law and burglar arrives. The son takes advantage of his father's absence from the room, greeting his daughter's friends, to try and rob his father's safe but is unsuccessful due to the fact that his father and the burglar repair to that particular room for a smoke. Finding no cigars at hand the father steps out to get some and the burglar goes to the window hidden by the curtains, and watches the street without. The son, thinking the coast clear, returns and opens the safe and is about to get away with his father's money when the burglar steps out from behind the curtain and stops him. Hearing the father returning the burglar shoves the boy back of the curtain and tries to put the money back in the safe, but is caught by the father. The father calls his daughter and sweetheart to witness that their experiment of trying to reform a burglar is a failure for he points out to them that he has caught the burglar red handed. He starts telephoning the police when his son steps out from behind the curtain and makes a clean breast of it all. The father sternly disowns his son but the burglar pleads with him to give the boy another chance. He finally agrees and leaves the room with his son. The burglar turns to the other two and seeing his presence is not needed quietly leaves the room, alone. Harold and Myrtle plight their troth.

THE RETURN TO LIFE
Majestic Release, April 14

Henry Boardman has no interest in life except his law business, to which he has devoted himself so tirelessly that he has undermined his health. The realization of this comes when he faints in his office and has to be driven home in an automobile. Staggering toward his door, he draws his handkerchief from his pocket, and presses it against his face, at the same time dropping his pocketbook, which lies unnoticed, either by himself or the chauffeur. The family physician who is hastily summoned by Boardman's butler, tells the lawyer that he has come to the parting of the ways between business and health. That he must change his mode of living or the end will come in a few weeks. That he should live wholesomely and simply like a poor man.

The purse is found by Tessa, a little Italian apple girl, and fearing that she will be accused of theft if it is discovered in her possession, she takes it home, resolves to send it by mail to its rightful owner. This course meets with the approval of her simple-minded parents, but not with that of Pedro, her unscrupulous lover, whom she fears, but dares not reject. Tessa finds money and papers in the pocketbook, and mails these, with a note to Boardman, the purse itself being too bulky for the envelope. Pedro protests in vain against this incomprehensible honesty.

The next morning Boardman receives his money and papers, and resolves to visit their finder. He finds Tessa and her parents in their poor tenement home, and is impressed by the beauty, sincerity and honesty of the girl, and the simple kindliness of her father and mother. He rewards her and goes, and the idea comes to him that here, among these people, he can find the mode of living which his doctor has prescribed.

Boardman returns home, removes his beard, assumes the garb of a working man, and returning to the tenement, rents a room from the girl's parents, they and Tessa not recognizing him. Tessa's beauty and goodness make a deep impression on him. He lends her books, and she proves an eager and intelligent student. All this is viewed with deep disgust and jealousy by Pedro.

Tessa's father is injured and it becomes necessary for some one to undertake the support of the family. Pedro promptly repudiates this task, and Boardman steps into the breach, and goes forth as a laboring man. He is seen at his work, and afterwards at dinner, with the family, eating the plain food with an appetite he had not enjoyed for years. The admiration between himself and Tessa deepens into love and her alert mind expands under his kindly tuition. This is viewed with the deepest resentment by Pedro.

Returning from work, one day, Boardman meets his family physician, who is astounded at the change in him. He leads the doctor to his little tenement room, and tells him of the life he has been leading. The worthy doctor examines Boardman, assures him that the following of his prescription has met with success and that he can now go back to his own world, sound in body and limb.

When Boardman tells Tessa that the time for parting has come, her love for him cannot be concealed. He is overjoyed at this confirmation of his hopes, and the little Italian girl goes with him to his home as his wife to enjoy what will be a new life for her.

Majestic Release, April 16

Richard Thornley prefers Stewart Blake as a suitor for his dauhter, Madge, because he is wealthy, and Madge prefers Phillip Allen for the world-old reason that she loves him. When Blake asks Thornley for the girl's hand, he naturally receives a favorable answer, the father not knowing of Phil's attentions to Madge.

Gilbert Thornley, the girl's brother, is attracted by Blake's mode of life, and plays poker with him, and his wealthy friends, the result being heavy losses for the boy. He applies to his father for money, which is reluctantly supplied to him. More losses, and another request meets with an absolute refusal from the old gentleman, and, overcome by temptation, Gilbert takes a considerable sum from his father's cash box.

Phil chooses this inauspicious time to ask Thornley's consent to a marriage with his daughter. He not only is refused, but, being found alone in the library immediately before the theft is discovered, is suspected by the father of having taken the money.

Thornley confides these suspicions to his son and to Blake, the latter at once realizing that Gilbert is the guilty one. But he is pleased to have suspicion fall on his favored rival. The boy, Gilbert, finds himself in a very delicate situation. He naturally is loath to accuse an innocent man, and if the truth about himself is discovered, and straightlaced old father will condemn him and his poker playing friend, Blake. So Thornley, senior, is advised to be sure that Phil is guilty before he accuses him.

At this juncture a remarkable situation lends itself to the clearing up of the mystery. The Thornleys and their friends are indulging in amateur theatricals, and good-natured Phil undertakes to portray a burglar, a part which the other men reject. In this capacity, Phil is to shoot a householder, played by the girl's father. Rehearsals proceed after the usual amateur manner, and the night of the performance finds everyone in nervous readiness.

Roughly-clad, masked and with his dark-lantern, Phil hurries to the stage, leaving his revolver in the dressing-room. The unscrupulous Blake finds the weapon, and a way out of his difficulties suggests itself. He removes the blanks with which the revolver is loaded, substituting ball cartridges, so that a real tragedy may take place.

The stage-manager is giving final instructions to the excited actors, and the curtain is about to rise, and Phil to make his entrance as the burglar, when he discovers that he has forgotten his pistol. The older Thornley agrees to get it, runs to the dressing room, and as he picks up the weapon, discovers that it is loaded to kill. He is about to rush out and denounce Phil, when a better method occurs to him. He takes out the ball cartridges and puts back the blanks, saying to himself that when the shot is fired he will know who planned his murder.

The play proceeds, the time for the shooting comes, and Thornley falls, feigning to be mortally wounded. Blake at onces dashes out on the stage, and accuses Phil of having planned the old gentleman's murder, the other actors gathering about, in wonder and horror. The supposed victim rises, faces Blake, and demands to know how he was aware that the revolver was loaded, drawing the ball cartridges from his pocket, and displaying them to the bewildered man, whose guilt is only too apparent. But he turns to Madge, and tells her that she preferred a thief to him. At this young Gilbert's conscience awakens, and he confesses to his father that he was the guilty one, and is granted forgiveness. Thornley withdraws his objections to the union of Madge and Phil, and the burden of guilt rests, where it belongs, on the shoulders of Blake.

A TANGLED WEB
Rex Release, April 11

Oh, what a tangled web we weave
When first we practice to deceive.

It was only a little flirtation, a little break in the gray monotony of her steady, settled life. She loved her husband, but she was a wee bit tired of the white lilies and the innocent violets, and her woman's heart hungered for the blood-red rose just a little way beyond the narrow path. So she plucked the sweet, tragic blossom, and she gave it her lips, and found it was a weed.

Man is a destructive animal, and he was just a man; so he did not pursue the blossoms torn and crushed and cast by his kind on the highway, but sought the buds just opening into light and life. It was only a little flirtation—you must never forget that. For the smile and the guile of him, she coquetted with disaster; for the lie that lies in a traitor's eyes she bartered a little of her soul. He was suave and she was simple; but it was only a little flirtation—you must remember that.

Women are often innocent in such a guilty way! She wrote him a note: "Meet me on the beach to-night." It was only a little flirtation.

You've heard the old parable, have you, of the spider and the fly, the trusting, confiding little fly and the plotting, pretending, luring, leering old spider? The spider became human in this story, and the fly was with him. . . . The spider began a-weaving his web.

That night the woman sat in her room, and a thought visited her mind, the thought that she had done a wrong. A bright, lone star glimmered in the skies above, gleamed and glittered like the eye of God, seeking her soul and searching its secret. It warmed and warned her—and she was saved.

We have said "he was just a man," but we will amend the statement, because he was not entirely. So he wrote her, telling her that money alone would be the price of his silence, and that unless a certain amount were paid him at once he would disclose the secret.

She loved her husband, you recall; and she wanted her husband's love. So she gave the money. And again the demand was made, and again it was met. And yet again he asked, and she had none to give. So she sent a companion her necklace, asking her to pawn it and give the vulture the proceeds.

Enter Fate. Her husband's fortune was suddenly swept away, and to save himself he asked for her jewels. In self-defense she told him they had been stolen, and the detectives he employed traced them to the other woman. The wife was really a good woman, so to save the friend from paying the penalty for a crime she did not commit, she confessed all.

Cheer up!—the same friend made the husband see that the silly, simple little wife evidenced her real character in telling the ugly truth, when a pretty lie could have saved her.

And the rest of the story was told in their kiss!

THE SEAL OF TIME
Rex Release, April 14

With the frozen desert all about them, under the chill Northern skies, a vast stretch of sombre gray, they plighted their troth. He had left the wilderness of mortar and steel with its lights and sights and tears and sneers to come to this land of night, with its cold and gold, to cut through the white for the yellow beneath.

And the girl, brave in her hope that his hopes would be realized, had come with him. So standing there they looked out into the distance which he was to traverse, and they spoke to the stars and received their message.

His goal was gold; and he took the trail. For days he searched it, and found only despair. Then—he broke his leg.

An old Indian found him, alone and suffering, and took him to his hut. For days he nursed the injured limb, and for weeks, weeks that were eternal, weeks that were making destiny, the wanderer loitered in the camp of the Indian.

Never a word reached the girl, and in her lonely longing she called his name, and only the wind replied. Then she received a letter from man's world, from home, advising her that she had inherited a large fortune, and that she must return at once to complete the legal requirements for acquiring it.

She left; left also a note at the little inn telling her absent lover where and why she had gone. But fate caused the inn-keeper to transfer his property to another; so that when the man returned after the weary months he was told she had left, but had left no word, nor message. And despair owned him.

He wooed forgetfulness; he sold his manhood for an hour's truce from the war in his mind; his soul went to sleep and dreamed cruel things; and because a beast cannot reason, he became a beast.

He did the menial labor about the saloon for another drop of the miserable, happy poison, and once, while the proprietor was not looking, he tried to steal a bottle. But he was detected, and in the fury of the other's rage he hurled an old tea-pot at him; the object crashed to the ground, and a slip of paper rolled out, the paper that contained the knowledge and the truth. Once he read it, and his heart beat in victory over the foe in his thougbts.

But sometimes, Mr. Reader, defeat is a greater triumph than victory. He borrowed the money to return to the city. . . . She had sent for him and searched for him, and destiny bad made her think he had forgotten, so she promised another. . . . He came to the house, peeped in through the window, saw her and another and the only third person that never makes three a crowd and he realized, realized that fate had won the race, that he was ten minutes late to his life's happiness, and he knew thenceforth that only his body would live. Slowly he turned, slowly he walked away, to face the morrow's years and tears.

A GAY DECEIVER

Champion Release, April 17

Percival Smith kisses his wife affectionately good-bye and makes his departure. On the outside of his home he flirts with two fair dames and follows in their wake. He catches up with them at the park, and neglecting to proceed to his office he enters a cafe. Here we see the propensities of the gay deceiver for the fair sex. He starts to flirt with a waitress and his newly made lady friends take umbrage and depart in high dudgeon. Unblushing, undeterred, and undisturbed, he continues to pet his fair Priscilla until the manager takes bim bodily and flings him into the street.

He picks himself up, adjusts his anatomy and betakes himself to pastures new. A pretty chorus girl is leaving the stage door of a theatre. The gay deceiver approaches her in a mincing manner. She rebuffs him, he persists, she flaunts away, he follows fast. Around the corner they go and she tells a cop, and into this copper's brawny embrace comes rushing the gay Lothario. But the deceiver sprints away and thus escapes.

Next a janitor of buxom form comes under his observation, but when he assays to touch her, she meets him with a bucket of water. The next day at his office we find him feeding chocolates to his stenographer, whispering to her softly and printing luscious kisses on her lips. Suddenly his faithful spouse appears. In a rage she rushes home and engages her housemaid's services. An hour later, her startled husband learns over the phone that his home has been invaded by one of his own species. He rushes home and discovers a personage seated in his wife's lap. He summons a policeman and then he courageously smashes the high hat from the head of the affinity. The hat flies off and from beneath rolls a mass of hair showing the features of his maid. A feeling of revulsion comes over him and he then swears off. On the same reel:

BERMUDA

A fleeting glimpse of some of its wondrous beauty and rare charm, caught by the camera, that may be justly designated, "most remarkable." Its scenic investiture is of surpassing loveliness and divinely gorgeous in atmosphere. Even the depths of the ocean are made to give up its wonders and we have brought up to our vision the finny hosts of this region in a remarkable exhibition of deep sea photography.

BABY'S ADVENTURES

Champion Release, April 15

Mr. and Mrs. Smith live in Harlem. Their six-months-old baby boy is a joy in tbeir lives. One morning the fond mother, after rocking him to sleep, orders the maid to put him in his crib for his morning nap. The maid hears tbe call of a baker's boy, with whom she is in love. She places the baby in a half filled clothes basket and runs out to meet her sweetheart. A gust of wind from the open window blows the tablecloth over the basket, hiding the sleeping child.

The colored woman who does the washing for them calls in the meantime for the week's wash. Bedelia, the cook, seeing the partially filled basket, places the balance of the clothes on top of the sleeping child. The washerwoman takes the basket and departs. The maid returns, misses the basket and informs the parents, and then begins a chase for the recovery of Baby. The baker's wagon is brought into service. The washerwoman takes a street car. The distracted father and the maid reach the ferry just too late to catch it. The washerwoman lives in Jersey, so the chase continues.

After a series of adventures the father arrives just in time to prevent the washerwoman from dumping the contents of the basket into a huge pot of boiling water. Happy in the possession of his child, the proud father starts back to Harlem and his distracted wife. While plodding wearily back to the street car he meets an acquaintance who offers him the use of his baby's buggy. On their way they pass near tbe Palisades. Curiosity leads them to the edge and while they stand admiring the beautiful sight, a strong wind sets the buggy agoing, and before the party turn around, it is too late. The carriage with the baby has descended a sheer drop of two hundred feet. Again the baby is lucky. A friendly tree breaks tbe fall, leaving the baby uninjured. A long rope is secured. A man volunteers to descend, and he is lowered down over the cliff to the final rescue of this adventurous baby.

HELIOGABALUS, TYRANT OF ROME

Chapter from the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire
Gaumont Release, April 28

A dissolute and bloodthirsty Emperor is on the throne, and a gorgeous representation of the Roman Court with its sumptuous surroundings and kaleidoscopic colorings is portrayed.

In the year 218 of the Christian era Heliogabalus was proclaimed Emperor by the soldiers, after defeating his rival, Macrinus. His reign of nearly four years was infamous for his gluttony and unparalleled debaucheries. At the age of 14 he was invested with the royal purple, and Rome soon displayed a scene of cruelty and licentiousness, among which the most infamous of the populace became favorites of the youthful Cæsar. This film depicts a few instances of the Tyrant's cruelty and also his well merited and cowardly end.

One day, while attending to the Emperor's toilette, a slave makes a slight mistake, and Heliobahalus, crying out in rage, immediately condemns the poor servant to death. Falling on his knees the unfortunate creature begs in vain for his life, and is dragged away by the soldiers and thrown as food to the lions. Next, a banquet is seen in progress at the Royal Palace; amidst the theatrical pomp and rain of flowers, the revellers are observed in convivial mood. The splendid feast ordered by the Emperor is drawing to a close when frightful roarings are heard, and the doors opening, a troop of lions bound into the hall. A panic takes place, and the stricken guests, fleeing from the threatening danger, rush along the passages, madly endeavoring to find the quickest means of exit.

At length, disgusted by this reign of folly and brutality, the Pretorians (who were instrumental in placing Heliogabalus on the throne) resolve to make an end of the tyrant. Surrounding the palace they inform the monster that he must die. Groveling on his knees, the cowardly Heliogabalus beseeches mercy from those who but a short time before had trembled before him. His end is speedy, for they plunge their spears into the Tyrant's body, and thus ends the life of one whom history has surnamed the "Sardanapalus of Rome."

THE DRUGGED CIGARETTES

Gaumont Release, May 5

Callard, the banker, and his daughter, Clara, together with two clever, fashionable society thieves, of suave and cultured bearing, yet bold robbery-tactics, are putting up at a fashionable summer resort. It is the latter's desire to separate the banker from some of his wealth. To this end, they take a seat near the banker and his daughter, under the same large overspreading maple, and, under the pretence of leaving for an afternoon walk, the lady leaves her pocketbook behind on the bench where she had been sitting. The banker, noticing the portemonnaie, leaves his daughter and takes it up to the couple now on their walk. They thank him profusely, and ask him to accompany them on their afternoon launch ride out of seeming gratitude. The unsuspecting banker accepts their hospitality. While out on the water, the lady opens a box of cigarettes and offers them around, carefully seeing that the banker got a certain kind. It was heavily drugged, and soon put Callard soundly to sleep. While in this drugged condition the banker's pockets are relieved of a check amounting to $5,000. The two social highwaymen wake up their victim, who is highly embarrassed at his inexplainable breach of etiquette. After a seemingly very enjoyable afternoon, the three part. On his approach to the hotel piazza, the banker's young daughter runs to him asking him to keep her money for her while she plays at tennis. He then discovers the loss of his check from his coat pocketbook. After running down several clues, he lastly suspects his two hosts of the afternoon. However, he only spreads his suspicions to his daughter, who forthwith commences to run down the culprit. While her father engages the clever hostess of the memorable afternoon in earnest conversation, the daughter steals the cigarette case from her pocketbook. Taking them out, she substitutes others of harmless ingredients and returns the cigarette case to its original place in the hand satchel. She gives one of the doped cigarettes to a servant of the hotel, only to see him fall to sleep at once. She then has her suspicions confirmed, and prevails upon her father to expose the two thieves with their own devices. They choose the veranda at noon time as the place for turning their trick. As arranged the banker and his daugbter take the same table with the clever duo. After the repast, they offer their own cigarettes to the man and woman, who unsuspectingly accept the drugged "smokelets." Of course, they fall to sleep. Callard and daughter call the guests of the hotel, summon the police, and have the social thieves arrested. The clever little detective had foiled them at their own game.

No. 1000—A MOTIOGRAPH

Just a Little Better

Every Line Makes THE MOTIOGRAPH the Machine of Efficiency

THE MOTIOGRAPH ENCOURAGES IMPROVEMENT IN THE OPERATOR.
THE MOTIOGRAPH SHOWS A DECIDED IMPROVEMENT IN PICTURES.
THE MOTIOGRAPH CONSTRUCTION IS DISTINCTLY BETTER.
THE MOTIOGRAPH WILL OUTWEAR ALL OTHERS WITH PROPER CARE.

Five years of faithfulness, of keeping worthiness above price, and quality above sales, counts to-day in every MOTIOGRAPH.

We may be old-fashioned, but this spirit of trustworthiness will continue as a part of our policy and quality will go into every MOTIOGRAPH before price goes on.

Increased advertising will increase sales but it sometimes results in decreased efficiency.

We want every owner, manager and operator to send for our 1912 catalog—It is free.

"Winona"

An Indian story as sweet as "Hiawatha," with a plot peculiar for its fascination and truth to nature. Situations that thrill and surprise at every turn. PECULIAR because it is not like the average Indian story. FASCINATING because of the charm that clings to the life of the Redman.

A touch of human nature that makes the whole world kin. A story of a priest and a burglar. The incense of the altar and the sanctity of worship on the one hand; the dissoluteness and debaucheries of life on the other. As to Imitators:

"They copied all they could follow,
But they could not copy our mind,
And we left them sweating and stealing
A year and a half behind."

—RUDYARD KIPLING.

During the year the MOTION PICTURE STORY MAGAZINE has been in existence it has had several imitators. Some of these have fallen by the way, in their struggle for existence; others are still struggling on.

One of these, has shown itself an adept at imitating our publication. Their cover, make-up, advertising and general character is a low grade copy of the MOTION PICTURE STORY MAGAZINE. Although such imitation is very flattering to us, it reflects nothing but dishonor on its perpetrators.

The MOTION PICTURE STORY MAGAZINE was the first standard magazine of its kind ever printed, and it has proved so popular that it now has a large international circulation. It is a great success, it is here to stay.

Recently its scope has been broadened to include Independent Stories. Its sale at Licensed Theatres will advertise both Independent and Licensed plays, and its sale at Independent Theatres will advertise both Licensed and Independent plays. One will help the other. The MOTION PICTURE STORY MAGAZINE thus stands for the increase of attendance at all theatres, the awakening of an interest of a new class of people in motion pictures, the uplifting of the whole motion picture business, and it is accomplishing its object.

If you are going to put anything on sale at your theatre you want the best, not a cheap imitation; you want something you know is here to stay. The MOTION PICTURE STORY MAGAZINE is high class, it is here to stay, it will advertise and help fill any theatre selling it.

You can obtain a supply for ten cents per copy, payable in advance, with the privilege of returning unsold copies at the end of each month, and receiving a credit or refund of 10 cents each. This arrangement is a fair one and insures both you and us from loss. The Magazine sells for 15 cents, your profit 5 cents. Slides and advertising matter are sent free. Just fill out blank below and mail with remittance.

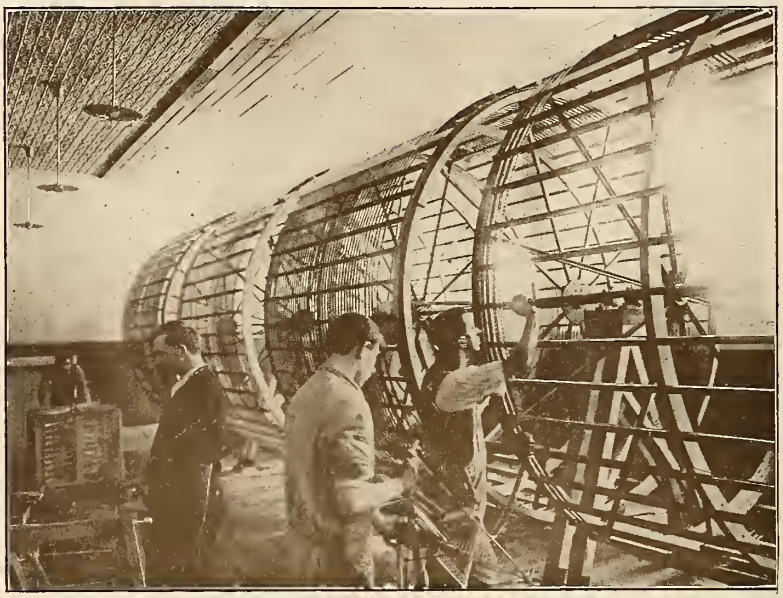
ECLAIR Film Quality

Is Made Certain by Certain Methods



THE FILM DRYING MACHINE

Did you ever notice many manufacturers advertise their methods of making pictures? They don't dare to. Eclair film advertises itself. The plays speak for themselves and the public asks for more. That is because our mechanical methods are so thorough that we do dare bring up the subject. Most films are made in dirty, dusty, cramped quarters and most makers care only for their immediate sales. They consider most buyers and exhibitors, and even most audiences, an aggregation of low-brows!

But the class of people who attend moving picture houses is becoming better every day. They have memories for good pictures and trade-marks. The Eclair trade-mark is recognized as the sign of steady, clear, clean film, and Eclair pictures are made for the coming years. We believe in steady, honest development of our business. The only way to gain that is by perfect machinery, expert operators and making film of the "buy-again" variety!

THE ART OF Scenario Writing

Second Edition By WILLIAM LORD WRIGHT

The MOVING PICTURE NEWS has secured the sole right to republish this standard work on Scenario writing, and offers it as a premium to all new subscribers of $2.00 for one year.

ART OF SCENARIO WRITING, separately, $1.00, post free.

Read what the Moving Picture World of February 25th, 1911, says of this excellent aid:—

The Art of Writing Scenarios

By William Lord Wright. Author of "Twixt Loyalty and Love," "Simon Kenton," etc., etc. Published by the Scenario Instruction Publishing Co., Bellefontaine, Ohio. Price $1.00.

In a very interesting series of articles published in our pages last month, Mr. G. R. Craw told the aspiring scenario author how to write scenarios. Those articles have been favorably commented upon as being of great practical value. Now comes Mr. W. Lord Wright with a little book of about 30 pages which still further adds to our knowledge of a subject that has perplexed many would-be moving picture authors, namely: How to set about work; how to acquire its technique; how, in fact, to prepare goods suitable for the market.

Mr. Wright, who is a successful scenario writer, first of all points out what is in demand by moving-picture makers. Then he indicates what is not wanted. After reviewing the function of the scenario editor, he gives some of his own experiences, his failure and his successes. Then we come to some practical advice. He tells the author how to get ideas; where to market the completed scenario; how it should be written and presented, winding up by printing a sample scenario as a guide. Finally, he points out the value of action in this branch of dramatic work, and takes the view that, though unhonored, the moving picture scenario writer may some day come into his own in the way of publicity, fame and fortune. We hope he will, though we think this agreeable state of things a long way off.

Meanwhile we welcome Mr. Wright's little book just as we welcomed Mr. Craw's articles. These things relieve us of some responsibility. We are often asked how a scenario should be written, where it should be marketed, and how much money there is in it? Mr. Wright answers all these questions for us. We invite all our readers who are interested in this department of dramatic work, to get a copy of this book and study the formula that he gives. Of course, it is one thing to give a formula for a moving picture scenario, or plays, or a novel. These things may be delivered to managers technically correct in every detail, and yet lacking the one essential which no book on earth can teach: The selection of a theme which will get over: this is the divine afflatus referred to long ago by the author of the phrase: Poëta nascitur, non fit: The poet is born, not made. So we believe is the scenario writer. Still, for the benefit of those who are not born and who think they can be made, Mr. Wright's book should be of great value. It will sell well on account of that. It may have a negative value, too, in that it may possibly act as a deterrent to many people who think they can write scenarios and cannot realize their unfitness for the work. There are two or three books extant, and they have run through numerous editions, on how to write plays. It is not on record that any playwright who has succeeded during the last quarter of a century traces any of his success to these manuals, which, perhaps, have been instrumental in diminishing the output of unsuitable plays. It is no easy thing to write a good play; it is no easy thing to write a good scenario. So we hope Mr. Wright's book will encourage the aspirant who aspires to some reasonable hope of success, will discourage those who have no fitness for this form of work. There are too many of the latter kind in the moving picture field to-day.

Ask these authorities what they think of the book: GILES R. WARREN, Author, Playwright, Editor, Lubin Mfg. Co.; C. B. HOADLEY, Editor Scenarios, Imp Company; HORACE VINTON, Author, Editor, Shamrock Company. We have endorsements on file from THE ESSANAY FILM COMPANY, THE POWERS COMPANY, CHAMPION COMPANY, THE IMP COMPANY and THE AMERICAN COMPANY. Also dozens of unsolicited testimonials from writers who have been helped by this work.

THE ART OF SCENARIO WRITING contains a sample scenario recommended as the best form, by GILES R. WARREN, who is acknowledged as one of the most successful and original scenario editors of the present day.

THE SHEET METAL BOOTHS

SINCE we published in our issue of March 16 the bill relating to sheet metal booths and our comments thereupon, many exhibitors have called upon us personally, have written us letters, and also 'phoned us asking our standing regarding a false advertisement which is being published in other papers reading as follows (this in italics): "If you do not get an asbestos booth by May 1st you cannot obtain a new license."

This clause is maliciously misleading. It is done for a purpose and is absolutely false, and we caution our readers about being bamboozled by specious reasoning, fully intended to make them spend enormous sums of money needlessly, to enrich a firm or firms who are desirous of putting forward their own products.

The law distinctly states, "A booth must be constructed with fireproof material," and does not state that this material shall not be sheet metal. We therefore desire our readers to carefully look after their own interests, and continue with what they have already got if it has passed the Board of Fire Underwriters. For the benefit of our readers we have legal opinion on this matter, which distinctly states that booths may be made of any approved fireproof material.

In further extenuation of the above, we put ourselves in communication with Mr. Morny, and he kindly furnished us with a copy of the authoritative letter which follows. This should at once allay any fears on the part of our readers whose interests we have always had at heart, and whom we endeavor to protect:

THE NEW YORK BOARD OF FIRE UNDERWRITERS,

J. C. Forsyth,
Chief Inspector.

New York, April 10, 1912.

Mr. L. O. Morny, Vice-President,
Tribune Bldg.,
N. Y. City.

DEAR SIR:—We beg to acknowledge receipt of your favor of the 7th inst., with reference to advertisement appearing in the Moving Picture World regarding construction of booths to enclose moving picture machines.

The New York Board of Fire Underwriters, while approving a booth constructed in proper manner of asbestos board or asbestos building lumber, also approves of a booth constructed of metal when complying with the general requirements.

The National Fire Protection Association at its annual meeting, May, 1911, issued specifications for both metal and asbestos booths, either of which will be satisfactory to us for the class of service referred to. I have no doubt but that if you have not a copy of these specifications you can very readily obtain them in case you may so desire.

Yours very truly,

J. C. FORSYTH,
Chief Inspector.

SOME MORE SUNDAY SHOWS

PROBABLY the most daring and difficult performance in horsemanship is that of endeavoring to ride more than one horse at a time; it is exciting, if not precisely dangerous, to try standing on two rickety stools; there are so many mounts in life which, in the event of precipitation, may land the rider in the sink hole of despond between two eminences upon the pinnacle of either of which he might have gained distinction and praise. The natural deduction from the foregoing would seem to be this, viz.: That straddling, unless in a single saddle, is bad business.

Your inquiry, "This question of Sunday law—we would like to ask our esteemed correspondent where we stand," is right to the point on the main issue; but the conditions should be revesed, for no one should know as well as you where you stand. I know just where I stand on this question, but, really now, where do you stand?

From what you have written and published, any one of several stands may be yours. Let me indicate a few, using deductions naturally following your utterances:

First: By indirection you may stand for advocacy of violation of the Sunday statute law, in opening the show places, upon the theory that, notwithstanding that law, it does not express the will of the people and should therefore be ignored.

Second: By argumentative inversion and declaration for enforcement, involving an adjustment of seeming fact to show the utter unreasonableness of the statute law, you may stand for incitement to violation of the law.

Third: Or it may be that you do stand indifferently for an enforcement of the law as it now stands.

However, your inquiry is capable of several interpretations. Does it mean that you want to know what the Sunday law is. If so, read what follows:

"The Sabbath.—The first day of the week being by general consent set apart for rest and religious uses, the law prohibits the doing on that day of certain acts hereinafter specified, which are serious interruptions of the repose and religious liberty of the community."

"Sabbath Breaking.—A violation of the foregoing prohibition is Sabbath breaking."

"Labor Prohibited on Sunday.—All labor on Sunday is prohibited, excepting the works of necessity or charity. In works of necessity or charity is included whatever is needful during the day for the good order, health or comfort of the community."

"Public Sports on Sunday.—All shooting, hunting, fishing, playing, horse-racing, gaming, or other public sports, exercises or shows, upon the first day of the week, and all noise disturbing the peace of the day, are prohibited."

"Theatrical and Other Performances on Sunday—The performance of any tragedy, comedy, opera, ballet, farce, negro minstrelsy, negro or other dancing, wrestling, boxing with or without gloves, sparring contest, trial of strength, or any part or parts therein, or any circus, equestrian or dramatic performance or exercise, or any performance or exercise of jugglers, acrobats, club performances or rope dancers on the first day of the week is forbidden; and every person aiding in such exhibition, performance, or exercise, by advertisement, posting, or otherwise, and every owner or lessee of any garden, building, or other room, place or structure, who leases or lets the same for the purpose of any such exhibition, performance or exercise, or who assents to the use of the same for any such purpose, if it be so used, is guilty of a misdemeanor."

From the foregoing you will observe all labor, excepting that of necessity and charity, is prohibited. Now a moving picture show is neither a work of necessity nor charity, and every such exhibition is an express violation of law. And every advocacy of the open show on Sunday is an incitement to a violation of law, and, if not a criminal act in and of itself, certainly the consummation of the act is.

Doubtless your position is brought about by a desire to serve a constituency which has much to gain in entrance fees from the open Sunday show, on the one hand, and on the other a more or less indifferent faith in the idea that the law as it now is should be supported and enforced.

Do not make much of the words, "The enactments of the legislatures are at least supposed to express the will of the people." Those enactments are the sovereign law of the land. Law is to be obeyed. Disobedience of it should be fittingly punished. These laws are the expression of the will of a majority of the people registered, for the time being, by the authorized representative of the separate constituencies of the various legislatures, and they (the laws) are entitled to wholesome respect of the people.

If you are advocating the desires of the constituency served by your valued and enterprising publication, regardless of personal considerations and beliefs, then there is a method of espousal of their cause against which no reasonable-minded person can seriously complain.

Solicit and demand the most absolute and rigid administration of the Sunday law as it is. Require the authorities to enforce the law in spirit as well as in letter. Insist with earnest zeal and peremptory demand upon the enforcement of the Sunday laws. Then if these laws are not desired by a large majority of the people, the legislators will be advised of the public demand for a revision or repeal thereof, and the statute law will change, as it frequently has done before, into the more modern will of the people.

In this land of ours the law should be the will of the majority and the earnest effort of all educators and publicists should be to encourage faithful adherence to the law as it is. And if the law seems unsatisfactory, then the sources of authority should be educated into making proper changes.

A NEW CAMERA

The other day we went to the Aviation Film Company to see our friend, Israel Ludlow, who incidentally asked us (after we had talked aviation films) how we would like to see a new camera. We replied, "Immensely," and he brought out of an inner office a camera he has adapted, and which he said fully escapes any patent claims that may be brought against it. It is certainly unique in its working. To describe it in general terms, we noticed it has a positive and exact intermittent movement. The wearing parts were of great strength, insuring stability. It was original and simple in design, working on an entirely different method to what we have hitherto seen. It has a frictional drive which Mr. Ludlow claims does not infringe on any patent extant. It has also a backward and forward movement of the film, suitable for trick purposes, and is very easy of operation. If any of our readers desire further particulars and will write to Mr. Ludlow, 334 Fifth Avenue, New York, he will be pleased to give it to them.

THE ANIMATED WEEKLY

The Animated Weekly is certainly making wonderful headway and has proved so far to be quite a crowd and money getter. We understand they have put on one hundred camera men throughout the world and have room for one hundred more. When any particular event arises, such as the flood in the Mississippi Valley, or a riot with the workmen, or a powder explosion, or any of the one hundred and one accidents that may happen, the camera man of the Animated Weekly is always on the job. For those using the Animated Weekly new publicity stunts of great value are being devised, and we would advise our readers to watch for some startling announcements.

We understand Frank Winch is sending men to Newfoundland to take the Inauguration of the New Government, and that there will be posters in seven colors and gold issued of all these events. For particulars as to camera men and requirements from exhibitors, and to others interested, we would say write at once to Frank Winch, The Animated Weekly Company, 31 East 27th Street, New York.

BLAZING THE TRAIL

"101" Bison Feature

Faithfully reproducing the onward march of civilization across the Western country, "Blazing the Trail," the big "101" Bison two-reel feature shows the hardships and the perils which the pioneers encountered in opening a trail through the unsettled land.

The Cooper family is shown loading a prairie schooner with household goods and starting on the long journey. After traveling many days an emigrant train is sighted in the distance, and the Coopers join it.

Arriving in the Far West the Coopers decide to locate and part from the main train. Blake, a hardy young emigrant, has become very friendly with Jack Cooper, and has fallen in love with Helen, Jack's sister. He asks the elder Cooper's permission to remain with them, which is granted.

Preparations are made for the night's encampment. Blake takes a big canteen and goes to the far-off spring for water. In his absence a band of Indians approach the wagon. Alert, suspecting the savages, Jack Cooper and his father await them with ready rifles, but the Indians hold up their hands in token of peace. They are fed by the Coopers, and with assumed simplicity win the confidence of the emigrants. One of them asks Jack to see his revolver, and the moment it is in his hand he fires and wounds Jack. At the same instant another Indian strikes Cooper with a tomahawk and he falls lifeless. Mrs. Cooper meets a like fate. Screaming with terror, Helen is caught up by the savages, who steal everything from the wagon and burn the vehicle.

Blake returns and is horror stricken at the sight that meets his gaze. The still forms on the ground and the disappearance of Helen tell the tale. Overwhelmed with grief and rage, Blake swears to avenge the tragedy, and follows the trail of the Indians.

In the Indian camp there is wild rejoicing as the fair captive is brought before the chief. The weeping girl is placed in a tepee and a guard set before it.

Jack Cooper revives. Racked with pain as his senses return to him, he attempts to struggle to his feet. Slowly and laboriously he drags himself to the creek and quenches his fevered thirst. Blindly he gropes along until, exhausted, he falls fainting to the ground.

The emigrant train passing on its way goes by Jack, and he is brought back to consciousness. Burning with anger, the emigrants decide to teach the Indians a lesson, and gallop toward the Indian village.

Blake creeps to the top of a hill overlooking the Indian camp. An Indian sits there serenely unconscious of the white avenger behind him. Blake draws his revolver and takes careful aim. Just as his finger is about to press the trigger he realizes the folly of such an act, and picking up a rock he cautiously and slowly worms his way and brings the missile down on the Indian's head. He falls as if stricken by a lightning bolt, and Jack drags the body out of sight. Removing the Indian's apparel, Jack discards his clothing and dons the savage attire, including the head-dress and blanket, and then boldly walks into the Indian camp, concealing his face with a blanket.

He manages to reach the tepee where Helen is imprisoned, and slitting the back of the tent with his knife he effects an entrance. With a low warning he stills the frightened cry that leaps to Helen's lips, and she falls into his arms. Blake then resolves upon a daring scheme, and wrapping Helen in a blanket he attempts to leave the camp.

The plan fails. He is recognized and seized by a dozen savage hands. Tied to a post, he is turned over to the squaws for torture. Tiring of this sport, the Indians compel him to run the gauntlet. Wounded and exhausted, Blake falls, and as the chief is about to administer the death blow a startling interruption stays his hand.

While the Indians have been engrossed in torturing Blake, the emigrants have massed behind the crest of the hill, and a volley of lead is poured into the ranks of the redskins. Reloading quickly, the emigrants advance and another deadly volley causes the surviving Indians to scamper for safety, hotly pursued by the exultant white men.

Blake and Helen are triumphantly carried back to the emigrant camp. The next day the bodies of the dead are buried, and Jack, Blake and Helen sorrow over the two mounds which mark the last resting place of Mr. and Mrs. Cooper.

BROTHERS

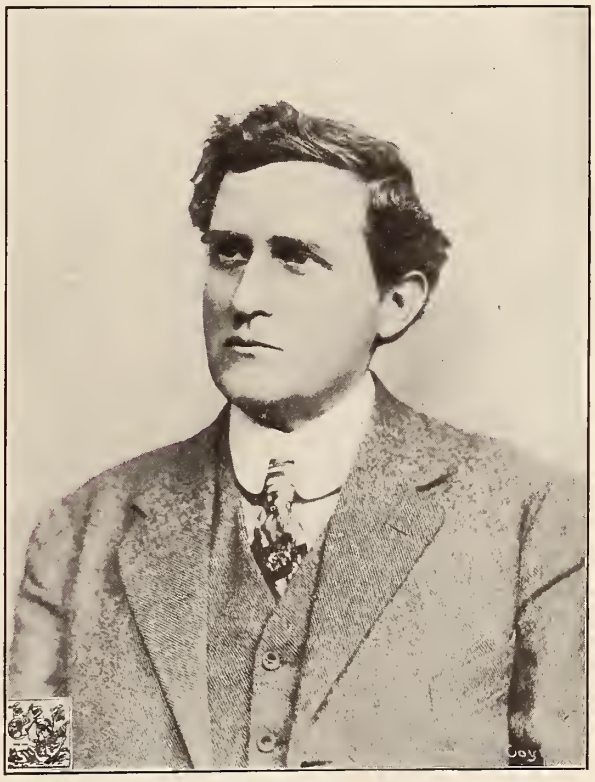
(Champion Release)

The above is a story of great power, the interest centering about two brothers who in the early portion of their career were surrounded by peculiar conditions. After a lapse of thirty years we see them on the film, one as a priest, and the other as a burglar. The story with the two dissimilar characters woven in and out through its fibres is one of great fascination. An unexpected situation occurs when one of the brothers (the burglar) takes refuge in the church and is protected by his priestly brother, though unaware of his identity. Later a mutual recognition comes about through a portrait of their mother. A pathetic though entirely satisfactory ending is the result.

The part of the priest is played by Mr. Frank B. Coyne, who is a native of Georgia, and who was originally intended for the Episcopal ministry. Mr. Webber, who plays the part of an elderly priest, also a Southern man, started his career in preparation for the priesthood. These two men are, therefore, splendidly adapted to the parts assigned them. Mr. Coyne has had a career of more than thirty years on the regular stage and five years in pictures, and has appeared in over four hundred different roles. Mr. Hoskins, who plays the burglar, is noted in the film world for his remarkable versatility as an artist.

Miss Francis and Miss Orlamond, who are also seen in this picture are fine types of womanhood. The former is an indefatigueable worker and a young woman of versatile talents. Miss Orlamond, who plays the mother in "Brothers," has had a wide and varied stage career, and is a young woman of very fine character.

In the photo-play of "Brothers" it may be stated that a more peculiar or more versatile cast has seldom been gotten together. It is unique in many respects and well adapted to the beautiful photo-story here presented under the title of "Brothers."



FRANK B. COYNE

THE MOVING PICTURE MOVEMENT

It would take the cinematograph itself to record the rapid development of this newest of the fine arts. In taking editorial cognizance of its progress every few months we can only call attention to a few of the more striking novelties. Most conspicuous among these is the solving of the problem of color reproduction. We believe it may be fairly called solved, for moving objects are now photographed in their natural colors, although not all of them are correctly represented. To obtain a perfect reproduction of all shades would require an exposure three times as rapid as the ordinary, that is to say, about a fiftieth of a second, and this is practically impossible, since the photographs have to be taken through colored ray filters, which absorb a great deal of light. The three-color process has, therefore, not yet been successfully commercialized, but a very fair substitute is found for it in the two-color process called the "kinemacolor." The two colors selected for this purpose are orange and its complement, which can only be defined as "white minus orange," a bluish green. The photographs are taken on a single roll of film alternately through filters of these tints and afterward projected through screens of the complementary color. These successive views ordinarily fuse together to the eye, although there is somewhat more flickering than in good black and white work. But when an object moves too quickly, the separate colors appear. Sometimes this produces a curious effect, for when a man walks across the foreground one leg is red and the other blue, as though he were a soldier in a motley Franco-American uniform. The kinemacolor comes as near to catching all tints as a two-color printing process, and is of course smoother in detail because it is photographic, not lithographic. In the pageants and reviews connected with the Coronation, where it was first employed, the scarlet coats of the British soldier, the green of the grass, the brown of the ground, and the blue of the waves were admirably rendered, but nobody would have suspected that there was any gold or brass about uniforms and armament, for yellow is left out from the kinemacolor spectrum.

The Italians have taken most enthusiastically to the motion picture. Convenient and attractive little theaters are to be found everywhere in Italy, and regularly attended, for the kinetoscope journal presents the news daily in the form of pictorial scenes, often more interesting and always more accurate than the best reporter could do it through type. The visits of royalty, the marching of troops, the launching of ships, the flights of aeroplanes, the burning of buildings, the racing of horses, the unveiling of monuments, anything of a spectacular nature, which can be reached in time, is promptly produced on the screens everywhere, and often seen to much better advantage than by the most favored spectators. How seriously the Italians take the subject is shown by their efforts to reproduce worthily in it their great national epic, the Divine Comedy. A group of Milan artists are said to have expended a year's time and $100,000 in the preparation of these films. They certainly show the marvelous capabilities of the new art. The grottos of the Bay of Naples and the smoking craters of Vesuvius afford a suitable setting for some of the infernal scenes, and we see Virgil and Dante passing through acres of naked human forms writhing upon the lava beds, or ferried across a lake filled with despairing sinners that cling to the boat with hands and teeth. As in the poem, so in the pictures, Inferno is more easily depicted than Paradise. The kinetoscopist seems competent to make real anything in the lower regions that Dante or Doré could imagine; the demons fight in mid-air, doomed souls see visions of the sins that brought them there, the giant Anteus picks up Virgil and Dante on his palm and lowers them into the ninth circle, the decapitated Bertran de Born carries his grimacing head in his hand like a lantern, and finally at the center of the earth there is Lucifer, eternally Fletcherizing that tough morsel, the head of Judas, whose feet are kicking out between his teeth. Demonology always contains an element of the ludicrous, and the torments invented by medieval theologians fail to frighten us nowadays. Still, the scenes thus vividly presented retain sufficient of the horrible to send women of very sensitive nerves into a faint or out of the theater.

But kinetoscopy is not only a new form of the drama and a new method of journalism, it is a new instrument of science, comparable in importance to the telescope and microscope. For, just as the unaided eye is incapable of seeing things far distant or very minute, so it is also restricted in the scope of its perception of motion. Change is imperceptible to us when it is either too fast or too slow. When man acquired control of special relations by means of lenses enabling him to enlarge or reduce to suit his purpose, the realm of the invisible was opened to his gaze in both directions, toward the stars and toward the atoms. Now he has for the first time brought time under the same control as space, and by means of the magic strip of film he can retard, accelerate or reverse the course of events at will. He has acquired a "time machine" almost equal to that imagined by Wells years ago. The growth of a plant, the progress of a disease, the development of an embryo, the engulfing of a microbe by a phagocyte, the formation of a crystal, the erection of a building, the expansion of a railroad system or of an empire, all such changes, too slow for actual appreciation, can be speeded up and brought within the scope of a few minutes by taking the photographs at sufficiently long intervals and running them off at any rate desired. On the other hand, motion too swift for human eye, the legs of a racehorse, the arm of a baseball pitcher, the passage of a bullet, the breaking of a bubble, the beating of an insect's wing, can be slowed down and studied step by step. It is wrong to regard such an instrument as this as a mere means of entertainment, and it is a great mistake to impose upon it, now in its infancy, such legislative restrictions as would confine it to the theater and practically exclude it from the school, the church and the family circle.

THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE RESOLUTIONS ON THE DEATH OF MR. CHALMERS

Dayton, Ohio, March 28, 1912.

RESOLVED, That we, The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, Ohio State Branch, in convention assembled this 28th day of March, 1912, do hereby extend our sympathy and deep regret to the family and friends of James P. Chalmers, editor of the Moving Picture World, of New York City, who, through an accident, met an untimely death while attending our State convention at the Auditorium of the National Cash Register Company, at Dayton, Ohio, on March 27th, 1912.

RESOLVED FURTHER, That we greatly deplore the fact that this should have occurred as the result of our urgent invitation to Mr. Chalmers to be present at our convention; thereby causing great sorrow to not only his family and friends but to all members of this league as well.

RESOLVED FURTHER, That we recognized in Mr. Chalmers a strong friend and advocate of our cause, one who always gave a listening ear to our pleadings for the betterment of the moving picture industry, and who, through his journal, voiced our sentiments to the people.

RESOLVED FURTHER, That we extend a vote of thanks to the National Cash Register Company, of Dayton, Ohio, for the great care and attention bestowed upon Mr. Chalmers from the time of his accident until his death.

RESOLVED FURTHER, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the family of Mr. Chalmers, to the journal of which he was the able editor, to the trade journals, to the National Cash Register Company, and that a copy be spread upon the minutes of this league.

Respectfully submitted,

Secretary.

A LETTER FROM THE M. P. E. L. OF PENNSYLVANIA

Pittsburgh, Pa., April 2, 1912.

To the Motion Picture Exhibitors of Pennsylvania.

Gentlemen:

We are sorry to inform you that it is impossible for us to hold our state convention at Harrisburgh, as we can get no one in that city to make the necessary arrangements, to assure the success that such a gathering of business men demands.

And as many of the manufacturing and business enterprises of our city promised to aid us financially and otherwise to entertain the exhibitors and their friends who would attend the convention, we thought it best to call the convention to meet in Pittsburgh, on Monday and Tuesday, June 24 and 25, 1912.

Now we ask the exhibitors of Pennsylvania and other states to join with us in making this convention the grand success it should and will be. It is not necessary that you should be a member of our League to come to the convention, as we would be glad to have you with us, as we know we need you and you need us, so come to Pittsburgh and aid in making the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League the one big organization of motion picture exhibitors.

Make arrangements to come to our city. We guarantee to all who attend a good and lively time, as the boys in the Smoky City are on the job as entertainers and people who do things. We also wish to let you know that Pittsburgh promotes progress, so make up your mind to be with us at our state convention on June 24 and 25, 1912, and let us hear from you.

We remain, yours for organization,

MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF PENNSYLVANIA,
233 Fifth Ave., Pittsburgh, Pa.

SIDE LIGHTS ON THE CINEMATOGRAPH

The Copyright Question in England

By Leonard Donaldson

The new Copyright Act has received the Royal assent in England, and is to become law on the first of July next. Provision is made in this bill for the effective protection of copyright in moving pictures, which are placed under the category of "dramatic work." This is in cases where "the arrangement of acting, form, or the combination of incidents represented, give the work an original character." It will no longer be possible to infringe an author's rights with impunity by means of either gramophones, speaking pictures or films.

Moving pictures are protected in two ways by this bill. One clause provides a term of fifty years for copyright in photographs from the original negative from which the photograph was directly or indirectly taken; while for the interpretation clause of the bill "dramatic work includes any piece for recitation, choreographic work or entertainment in dumb show; the scenic arrangements or acting form of which is fixed in writing or otherwise, and any cinematograph production where the arrangement or acting form, or the combination of incidents represented give the work of an original character."

By the previous act of 1842, copyright in books, musical and dramatic compositions, was to endure for the natural life of the author, and for seven years subsequent to his decease, or for a term of forty-two years in all from the date of publication, whichever was the larger period. The News Bill provides for the extension of the period during which copyright shall run to the life of the author, and for a period of fifty years after his death, provided that after the expiration of twenty-five years after an author's decease any person "may at will reproduce his work on payment to the author's legal representatives of a royalty equal to ten per cent of the price at which the works are published."

The new Act indicates that films come under the heading of "photographic," to which copyright was extended by an Act of Parliament passed in 1862 (about which period I understand the evolution of photography commenced). Under this act, numerous films have been registered at Stationer's Hall (the headquarters of the Copyright Department) by the proprietors of the copyright in them. These numerous "photographs" have been registered as a single "reel" of films on payment of the registration fee of one shilling.

I would further point out that the act of 1862 provides for the separate registration of each photograph taken from a different negative, and it is doubtful whether the single registration of one reel film would be held in law to cover the copyright of the many photographs appearing thereon. Under the existing law, therefore, registration of one film is quite sufficient to protect the film from piracy! The Act of 1862 refers in all its provisions to a "photograph" or "the negative of a photograph" and not to a "reel." or a number of photographs being the subject of one registration.

The new provision says that copyright shall exist throughout His Majesty's Dominions "in the case of a literary, dramatic or musical work, to make any record, perforated roll, cinematograph film, or other contrivance, by means of which the work may be mechanically performed or delivered."

The new act is without a doubt a long step in advance in the matter of protecting the varied interests of all those connected with the picture-play.

PAUL J. RAINEY JUNGLE PICTURES

Beginning Monday evening, April 15, by arrangement with Charles Frohman, there will be presented at the Lyceum Theatre, the Paul J. Rainey African Jungle Picture Lectures. These pictures illustrate in detail the famous expedition of Paul J. Rainey, the well-known Cleveland millionaire, who, at an expenditure of over $250,000, conducted the greatest hunting party known in the world's history. Mr. Rainey, unlike other hunters who in the past penetrated the most inaccessible portions of Africa in search of big game, employed in his endeavors the aid of 100 American dogs.

These dogs were first trained in hunting big game in the cane brakes of Mississippi and Louisiana. Their wonderful courage so impressed Mr. Rainey that he felt sure that the dog, and not the lion, is the king of beasts. To prove this, he set out from America for Africa, and the story of the achievements of these dogs is told in a series of marvelous motion pictures.

Among the many pictures taken is that of the water hole, which is said by Professor Osborn, president of the American Museum of Natural History and Dean of the Faculty of Pure Science at Columbia, to be the greatest contribution to natural science of the past decade. The pictures of the water hole were taken after a photographer had spent three days in a tree, waiting for the animals to emerge from their jungle homes. Here are shown such animals of the jungle as elephants, rhinoceri, giraffes, deer, zebra, monkeys, etc., who come down to the water hole to lave their thirst and bathe. From the pictures of these animals it would appear that an armistice or truce exists between them, and that the water hole is neutral ground where the animals meet, with an understanding that so long as they are there, they shall respect each other's peace.

Aside from the serious character of the picture, many laughable scenes are shown, showing that the wild animals have a sense of humor. There are also many domestic touches, which are almost human in their character. As the pictures are displayed, a lecturer—a gentleman who accompanied the expedition—will explain in detail their character, and the circumstances of the expedition, from its inception until its termination.

WM. E. SMITH, E.E., OFF FOR HONDURAS

That clever young manipulator of the abstract force electricity, Mr. Wm. E. Smith, E.E., left New York by rail on Monday at 12 o'clock, for New Orleans, from whence he departed by steamship for San Pedro, Honduras.

Mr. Smith will be absent from New York for at least a year, during which time he will be engaged on the installation work of a power house at San Pedro-Sula, which is a suburb of San Pedro. This power house will supply San Pedro with power for electric lighting, etc.

We wish Mr. Smith success and good health, which is the generator of most other good things, while he is absent from among us.

OPERATORS' PAGE

By Esau Shindler

Well boys, I had the pleasure to speak to Edward T. McDermott, President of Boston Local 182, the other day and was glad to hear that our dear Boston local is growing and improving in its work every day. They are doing fine, as every operator in Boston belongs to the Union and every house in Boston employs Union operators. The Local has grown so large that they were forced to move from their offices at No. 782 Washington street to larger quarters. In about a week or so they will occupy the entire third and fourth floors of the building at No. 113 Elliot street. They are also going to have some large improvements in trying to assist their brothers, by having different sections arranged; one, so that a brother can come in when not at work, can sit down and rest himself and meet other fellows there and talk matters over, etc., also many other different sections. They are also going to instal a new board to inspect all applicants wishing to join the Union. There is some class to our Boston Local, isn't there boys? When we have a man like Eddie McDermott, and he is some boy, you can believe me, as I've known him for the last three years as an operator and I surely can say that he is one of the finest men a person can speak to, in short words, he is a perfect gentleman. Ever since he was elected president the Union has been making out good and we Boston fellows all appreciate his kind work. Each Union in every State should have such an executive. Hail to our Boston Local, wishing them more and more success and luck in their existence.

Executive staff of Boston Local 182, I. A. T. S. E.: Edward T. McDermott, president; William C. Frank, vice-president; Harry Danto, financial secretary; John Mandeville, recording secretary; Thad. C. Barrows, treasurer; David F. Cowan, press representative.

Salem, Mass., April 9, 1912.

Dear Friend: I have been a reader of the "News" for quite a while and I don't think that I could get along without it. Every time I get it I have to walk a mile to the nearest store or paper stand, but I agree to say that I would even be satisfied to walk three miles for it, because it is worth while. I have read your helps to brother operators and I have also tried the spotlight, which one of our brothers sent in some time ago, and I am glad to say that it works fine. I have been an operator for not a very long while and have been getting along O. K. and never had any troubles with machines, etc. But a few months ago we installed a new Powers' No. 6 in our theatre and the workings are O. K., except a few things and those are, when I run a reel off the letters and titles of the picture appear kind of streaky on the screen, and also one corner of my picture is not visible. I looked all around the machine and I could not find any faults, nor could I locate the cause of this. If you could give me some of your kind advice relating to this, I would thank you very much, as it would be a great favor to me. I also have another bit of trouble once in a while with the film. Our house runs first-run goods and some times the film makes a noise like cracking and the picture starts to shake. I also would like to know if you could help me in remedying this case.

Trusting to hear from you soon and thanking you very much, I remain,

Yours very respectfully,

N. D. M.

To N. D. M.,

Dear Sir: I have received your kind letter and I can say that I am always ready and glad to give my fellow brothers assistance all I can possibly do. I am very sorry to hear that you have a little trouble with your machine and I will try my best to remedy it for you. The way you say that your picture appears, kind of streaky and one corner of it cannot be seen, then it may be the cause of that the outside shutter being out of adjustment, and I guess if you follow my directions you will get it to work all right. The best way to do is, turn your balance wheel toward the front till the intermittent sprocket just begins to move, then loosen the fan on the shaft and turn it so that the big blade, the one with the trade-mark stamp on it, is half way across the front of the lens. Then tighten your screws and I think that this will remedy the difficulty, if not, you can push the fan a little up or down till the streaks are removed. Now, we shall come to trouble No. 2. As you claim that the film runs kind of noisy and the picture jumps some times. Well, my dear boy, if I am not mistaken, this cause is, as you say, that you also run first-run reels, first-run reels are the reels with a lot of emulsion on it, and while the film passes the rollers it goes down to the tension springs, and while this emulsion softens a little while going through the machine, part of it rests and sticks onto the tension springs and hardens up. Care should be taken to scrape this emulsion off at once, if not, it might do damage to the film, such as scratching it. The shaking of the picture may also be due to this cause, or that you have not got a loop large enough for your bottom or top sprockets, or it might be the tension springs are not tight enough. Hoping that this will remedy your case, and many thanks for your letter. Let us hear from you often; don't be bashful.

SETTING FAN IN ADJUSTMENT.

Pawtucket, R. I., April 5, 1912.

Dear Sir: I am having a bet with another fellow and I would like to have you judge it. A claims that when the coils of a rheostat become red hot there is more resistance introduced in the circuit; B says the opposite. Will you please let us know which one of us is right?

Yours very truly,

C. H. D.

To C. H. D.,

Dear Friend: In regard to your bet I can say that B is right. When the coils of a rheostat become red hot there is less resistance introduced in the circuit.

Here is a nice little sketch of a table for rewinding and mending film for the operating room. This is a very helpful thing to many operators and I am now using the same myself. It comes in very handy in making good, clear patches for film. Directions: Carve a little square in the table or bench and insert a piece of plain glass large enough to fill the hole and be sure that it is held tight. This proves a great help. Try it fellows and see. What is the matter, boys, that I do not hear from many of you? I want you all to wake up and let us know that you are still alive and not dead. We are able to give you all the space you wish and I want to hear from everyone of you, if you want to make this page a success.

Now you fellows know better than to be so slow, therefore, be sure to drop me a line after you are through reading our page. Hoping that this will wake you up and make you keep your eyes on the screen of the Operators' Page.

American Company Controlling This Only Known Process of Natural-Color Motion Photography Soon to be Installed in Handsome Permanent Quarters, Most Modern and Unique Models of Their Kind Score one more for the advance of Kinemacolor.

Another present evidence of the progress of the only known process of natural-color motion photography and the business growth of the organization which controls these fabulously valuable patents in this country, comes with the announcement made by Mr. Henry J. Brock, President of the Kinemacolor Company of America, that a lease has just been negotiated for the entire sixth floor of the Mecca (formerly Studebaker) Building, at Broadway and Forty-eighth street, for a term of years at a large annual rental and where will be installed, by the first week in May, the executive offices of the parent company which operates the Urban patents on this side of the Atlantic.

The floor area of the new quarters of the Kinemacolor Company, which front on three thoroughfares, approximates 12,000 feet, which will be divided into most elaborate and complete suites of offices de luxe, in the Greater City.

Perhaps the most novel feature of these plans which have been drawn by Architect Henry Herts, who has designed many of New York's most beautiful and prominent play-houses, is a handsome salon sixty feet in length which will be illuminated when necessary by a series of indirect, invisible lights, and at other times will be absolutely light-proof. This salon which will be used as a model Kinemacolor demonstration room, will be decorated in general tones of royal purple, the walls being hung with heavy damask curtains. The ceiling, will be treated in dull gold. At one end of the room, veiled from view by draperies, when not in use, will be a massive gold and purple frame, against a wall of silver that forms an ideal background upon which to project the marvelous color reproductions, "Pictures painted by Nature's own hand," of the Kinemacolor process. This room will be built (as will everything in these new quarters) in the most thorough and approved fireproof construction, employing every known modern preventive, and here, too, will be on exhibition and for demonstration, all the latest safety devices and accepted appliances in use in motion picture photography as developed by the large staff of experts employed by the Kinemacolor Company, both here and abroad, and which have been accepted as standards of excellence.

There will also be a large fireproof and burglar-proof steel and cement vault, a museum for the examination and storage of rare and valuable original negative films, photographed in various parts of the world, which will here be tested and edited before being reproduced in reels of positives to be distributed throughout the United States and Canada for public exhibition purposes.

Practically no wood will be used in the treatment of the offices which will occupy the Broadway, Forty-eighth street and the Seventh avenue sides of the building, as the partitions will be fireproof terracotta clocks with metal trimming, copper and steel predominating. The executive suite, which has a sunny southern exposure, includes a handsomely furnished board room for the use of the directors, private offices for the president and his assistant, and the publicity and educational departments. There will also be a general reception room, supply room, bookkeeping department, a stenographers' room, private local and distance telephone booths and every other convenience for comfort and efficiency known to the modern business man.

Kinemacolor Company of America has recently added to its varied activities an educational department, which has for its sole object the taking and producing of color photographs of topics of distinct educational value. The department has been in smooth running water for the past few weeks under the direction of Mr. A. Bert Samuels, whose activities in the educational world in the past few years has rendered him peculiarly adapted to this work. Mr. Samuels is an A.B., M.A., of Columbia University and LL.B. of New York Law School and has until his connection with the Kinemacolor Company been instructor at the Stuyvesant High School. The work of the company has been recognized as of distinct educational and scientific value, and up to the time of going to press the company has by special request given demonstrations of its color photographs at the Stuyvesant and Wadleigh High Schools of New York—two of the largest schools of their kind in the country. The department of light of the Engineering Society recently discussed as a general topic of the evening at one of their meetings, Kinemacolor, and the faculty of the department of Physics of Columbia University, which holds special weekly meetings on Thursday afternoon, for the purpose of discussing scientific subjects, has requested the Kinemacolor Company to give a scientific demonstration of their films and machines—the demonstration to take the place of the customary scientific weekly discussion. Prof. Hallock, Chairman of the Physics Department of Columbia University, will open the meeting on April 18th with an address on Kinemacolor.

The success which the educational department has met in its infancy is strikingly encouraging. Letters from all parts of the country keep constantly pouring in and all speak only in superlatives of the value of Kinemacolor as an educational force.

On and after Monday, April 1st, Mr. Charles Urban will contrive to find space somewhere in the present copious Kinemacolor Durbar program at the Scala Theatre to present a complete life-motion record in natural tints of the University Boat Race, 1912—scenes which will be the more closely followed by reason of the adverse conditions of rain and flood which have debarred many persons from witnessing the practice of the respective crews. Ten or twelve days later will come from the Riviera the films illustrating the impressive public ceremony attending the unveiling at Nice, in the presence of a large gathering of French and British troops, of the memorial to Queen Victoria; also a series reproducing the Nice Carnival.

Everywhere, both at home and abroad, Kinemacolor advances irresistibly, the latest important theatre to fall into line being the Grand Opera House, Belfast, which reopened on Monday last, March 25th, with a Kinemacolor program.

Kinemacolor is now in the tenth successive month of triumph in New York City.

Seven "companies," comprising a manager, advance manager, operator and musical director and apparatus, are now en tour in as many sections of the country with great success.

Two hundred and forty-two thousand New Yorkers witnessed "The Coronation" alone and more than that number have viewed "The Durbar" and paid Broadway prices for the privilege.

THE ANIMATED WEEKLY CATCHES NEW YORK MAYOR LEAVING CITY HALL BOWING TO CITIZENS

"The moving picture man will get yo' if yo' don't watch out." He got Mayor Gaynor and a crowd that had gathered in the plaza in front of the City Hall when they saw the machine being put up. Soon scenes of the Mayor descending the steps at the hall and bowing to citizens will be shown in theatres all over the country. Two other moving picture concerns have arranged to take similar scenes.

The man yesterday had planned to have his machine ready to get the Mayor as he walked over the Brooklyn Bridge at 10 o'clock in the morning, but he had a breakdown somewhere along the line and did not arrive until just before the Mayor was going out at noon. Expecting that the Mayor would go to the Hardware Club for luncheon the man fixed his machine so as to get him walking toward Broadway. He received a tip just before the Mayor came out, however, that he was going to Brooklyn, and had just time to change his machine before the Mayor came slowly out.

The Mayor paused a minute on the stairs, tipped his hat and then stopped to greet a friend as he reached the plaza. All of which was caught by the machine, which was still going around as the Mayor was lost in the traffic of Park Row.

THE INSTALLMENT PLAN
(Majestic Release, April 23d)

A French count and installment plan furniture form an unusual combination in this novel farce.

An ambitious but poor father of a pretty daughter, furnishes his drawing room on the installment plan, to impress a wealthy foreigner, who comes with a letter of introduction. An ingenious American lover succeeds in getting the furniture removed twice. On the last occasion it is literally jerked from under the astonished count.

The father devises makeshift furniture from barrels and boxes, covering it with draperies. The lover forthwith saws these nearly in two, and when the count again presents himself, one piece of furniture after another crashes to the floor with him.

He tells the family, in French that anyone might understand, what he thinks of them, and departs, excitably and finally. The lover suggests that American husbands are perhaps better, and the father agreeing, the furniture is restored once more.

DOWN AND OUT
Majestic Release, April 21

An old tragedian and a young comedian, friends and room-mates, are in desperate straits and are dispossessed from their boarding house. They go to an attic room, and from there the younger man goes forth and secures a position as a valet. His first act in this capacity is to take out a suit of his employer's clothes to be pressed. His second is to run and tell his friend of his position.

The tragedian has just been summoned to a manager's office to secure an engagement, but he must go "dressed to suit the part." The comedian gets his employer's suit and lends it to his friend. Fashionably arrayed, the tragedian presents himself before the manager, who proves to be no other than the owner of the clothes.

Embarrassment follows, the valet is summoned, and the situation is explained. The manager's sense of humor and good-heartedness prompt him to give an engagement to the tragedian, and the young comedian as well, and they depart in triumph with their contracts.

THOMAS BULFINCH says that if no other knowledge deserves to be called useful but that which helps to enlarge our possessions or to raise our station in society, then Mythology has no claim to the appellation. But if that which tends to make us happier and better can be called useful, then we claim that epithet for our subject. For Mythology is the handmaid of literature; and literature is one of the best allies of virtue and promoters of happiness.

We believe that an epoch has been reached in educational and literary excellence of cinematography in the filming in three reels of Homer's Odyssey by the Milano Films Company. In fact, the release of this great subject is deemed of such importance to the educational advancement of the moving picture that we devote considerable space to the masterpiece this week.

* * * *

Without a knowledge of Mythology much of the elegant literature of our own language cannot be understood or appreciated. When Byron calls Rome "the Niobe of nations," or says of Venice, "she looks a Sea-Cybele fresh from ocean," he calls to the mind of one familiar with Mythology illustrations more vivid than the pencil can furnish. But how is Mythology to be taught to one who does not learn it through the ancient languages? To devote study to a species of learning which relates wholly to false marvels and obsolete faiths, is not to be expected of the general reader in such a practical age. But may not the subjects be acquired by viewing the fancies of the ancient poets in moving pictures? We think so. Consequently we reiterate that the Milano production is a distinct advance along educational lines.

* * * *

Homer, from whose poem of the Odyssey Milano has made its films, is almost as mythical a personage as the Hero Ulysses he celebrates. Bullfinch believes he was a wandering minstrel, blind and old, who traveled from place to place singing his lays to the music of his harp, in the courts of princes or the cottages of peasants, and dependent upon the voluntary offerings of his hearers for support. Byron calls him "the blind old man of Scio's rocky isle," and a well known epigram alluding to the uncertainty of his birthplace says:

"Seven wealthy towns contend for Homer dead,
Through which the living Homer begged his bread."

These seven cities were Smyrna, Scio, Rhodes, Colophon, Salamis, Argos and Athens.

Some modern students have doubted whether the Homeric poems are the work of any single mind. The date assigned to Homer, on the authority of Herodotus, is 850 B. C.

* * * *

The romantic poem of the Odyssey—"Wanderings of Ulysses," narrates his adventures in his return from Troy to his own kingdom, Ithaca. Arriving at the country of the lotus-eaters, three of Ulysses' men are given of the lotus plant to eat and they lose all thoughts of home. They must be dragged away by main force. Then the country of the Cyclopes. The Cyclopes were gigantic inhabitants of an island. Cyclopes means "one eye." Polyphemus, a giant dashes out the brains of several of the Greeks and devours them. Finally Ulysses plunges the end of a sharpened stick into the one eye of the giant and blinds him. The Greeks escape from the cave. The Greeks also escape in their vessels and the howling monster hurls a mass of rock after them which barely misses several of their ships.

Another adventure of the many is their experiences on the Aeaean Isle where dwelt Circe, daughter of the sun. Circe's enchantments change men into the forms of beasts. She changes Ulysses' companions into swine but they are rescued by the hero. Circe instructed Ulysses how to pass the coast of the Sirens, sea nymphs, with such power to charm by their songs that the unhappy mariners who heard the music were compelled to cast themselves into the sea. Ulysses placed wax in the ears of his companions and they sailed safely by.

Circe also warned Ulysses of the two monster Scylla and Charybdis. Scylla was a snaky monster, the other terror, Charybdis, was a sucking whirlpool. Scylla and Charybdis have become proverbial to denote opposite dangers that beset one's course.

* * * *

Many and varied adventures had the brave Ulysses before reaching Ithaca. More than a hundred nobles had been for years suing for the hand of Penelope, his wife, imagining him dead and lording it over Ulysses' palace. Minerva changed Ulysses into an unsightly beggar. Only Telemachus, his son, recognized him.

"Then threw Telemachus
His arms about his father's neck and wept.
Desire intense of lamentation seized
On both; soft murmurs uttering, each indulged
His grief."

At the place the usual scene of riotous feasting was progressing. The old beggar was permitted to enter. An old dog lay in the gateway almost dead with age. He saw the stranger enter and raised his head, with ears erect. It was Argus, Ulysses' own dog.

"Then his destiny released
Old Argus soon as he had lived to see Ulysses in the twentieth year restored."

* * * *

The suitors were insolent to the supposed beggar. Supposing her husband long since dead, Penelope consented to submit the question of her choice of a new husband to a trial of skill among the suitors. The test selected was shooting with the bow. Ulysses' bow was brought forth and it was necessary to bend the bow in order to attach the string. No person in the hall was able to bend the bow. Then spoke Ulysses humbly suggesting that he be permitted to try. Hoots of derision greeted the request. But Telemachus spoke for him and bade him try. Ulysses took the bow and with ease he adjusted the cord. Ulysses proving his identity was left master of his palace and possessor of his kingdom and his wife.

And thus ends the "Wanderings of Ulysses," so faithfully and magnificently pictured by the Milano Films Company. Too much in compliment cannot be said of the production and it is hoped that every person loving an elevating and at the same time entertaining production will witness the unwinding of the Milano films. It will give close familiarity with the classic and polite literature and will renew the popularity of mythology.

Tennyson's poem of Ulysses represents the old hero after his dangers past, and nothing left but to stay at home and be happy, growing tired of inaction and resolving to go forth again in quest of new adventures.

"Come my friends,
'Tis not too late to seek a newer world.
Push off, and sitting well in order smite
The sounding furrows; for my purpose holds
To sail beyond the sunset, and the baths
Of all the Western Worlds until I die."

Those film manufacturers who believe that the exhibitor is not keen to notice little touches that add to the beauty of a picture would have been agreeably surprised at the quantity of mail received by the American Film Mfg. Company since the release of its picture, "From the Four Hundred to the Herd," March 4. Many of these scenes were staged in and around the grounds and gardens of the famous million-dollar hostelry, The Hotel Del Coronado, at San Diego, Cal. No manufacturer could have produced such striking settings in a studio. For those who fancied the big range with its moving cattle, the picture swung to the ranch of the historian Bancroft, whose Western range is considered one of the finest of the country. "The Maid and the Man." releases April 1, contains interiors of the same hotel.

ADVERTISING MATTER FOR "THE SEWER"

Solax Release of April 24, and the Reason for the Name

Recently a batch of advertising matter for "The Sewer," the two-reel feature Solax production, was sent to an exhibitor. The parcel was weighed on a post-office scale, three pounds and two and a half ounces. The parcel contained copies of the three last issues of the Magnet, a cut, several still pictures, the issue of the Moving Picture News of March 30 with a write-up of the production, an advance copy of the Motion Picture Story Magazine for May, which was the story of the picture in excellent shape, and a number of excerpts from the Moving Picture World. All of this material, in addition to the one and three-sheets with which the exchanges will supply the exhibitors, will not only make an excellent feature display for this sensational subject, but will give the enterprising exhibitor sufficient ammunition with which to bombard the people of his neighborhood.

"The Sewer" is spectacular and sensational. The story deals with the criminal activities of an organized coterie of crooks who prey upon society. The gang meets its Waterloo after an attempt on the millions of a philanthropist. A boy, one of the gang's unwilling pupils, causes its round-up and its arrest.

The Solax Company has been asked, since its announcement of the name of this feature, why the company calls it "The Sewer." "What shall be the name of a picture?" is always a very difficult question to decide. Manufacturers change the names of their productions several times before the picture is released. A number of names suggested themselves before "The Sewer" was finally decided upon. Some of the names considered were "A Useful Present," the original title, "The Conspiracy," "The Underworld," "The Child's Rebellion," and numerous others descriptive of different phases, situations and ethical conclusions which the story of the picture suggests. None of these appealed to Madame Blache as much as the title finally chosen. "The Sewer" is not only suggestive of the underworld but it is descriptive of the type of humanity around which the story is woven. The name also describes one of the most spectacular, realistic and sensational scenes shown in pictures in many months.

THE FILM SITUATION

By Margaret I. MacDonald

During a review of that very excellent Solax release, "The Sewer," the remarkable qualities of this particular film caused me to reflect on the situation of the film industry, past and present.

As time passes and competition in the market waxes keener it becomes more and more evident that the trend of the trade is toward improvement in quality and subject; and each new effort suggests more and more the necessity of the moral and educational element in the picture.

"The Sewer," senational enough to satisfy the most sensation loving temperament, is at the same time so commendable in the matter of detail, atmosphere, action and morality, as to provoke only praise from the most fastidious philanthropist.

Although as much cannot be said of all the product of the present day film manufactory, still, such is absolutely true of the majority of filmed subjects as they are turned out to-day.

Yesterday?—it was not, so. Attention to detail has been sadly lacking in productions of the past, some of which we would rather forget than remember. But to-day as we see reel after reel of film developing varied and commendable subjects, when there flashes upon the screen the results of the most careful and studied production—evidences of united and concentrated effort in preparation—we are glad and proud, those of us who are connected with the industry, to be priviliged to take our places in the interminable line of film people who are gradually weaving themselves into the necessities of everyday life.

The film situation to-day is such that its services are in demand everywhere. Education, science, philanthropy, commerce, all stretch forth their hands in a clamorous appeal to the moving picture. As an advertiser, soon it will be second to none; and the usefulness of the newspaper even now pales at mention of the name of motion picture film.

OUR WESTERN CORRESPONDENT

Hot Springs, Ark., April 10.—Well, the greatest season is at an end. By the time this is converted into cold type the finale will have been written, and the local moving picture managers are beginning to look forward to those advertising stunts to draw the spring and fast-approaching summer patronage, for it won't be long before the heated season will take the place of the cool breezes of the past winter.

The past few months have constituted one of the most profitable seasons that the local moving picture houses have experienced. The reason for this is plain. There have been more people here this season than ever before and, naturally, they want amusement. They found it in the theatres and the clubhouses. The "lid" has been carefully removed and relegated to a place no one knows or cares about, and the result is that every one had a good time.

There has been little out of the ordinary transpire the past week. The respective houses have maintained the "peaceful tenor of their way" and given the patrons the best program they could get from their exchange, and there has been no material decrease in the business.

The Photo Play came forward the past week with the great two-reel feature, "The Deserter," with the "101 Ranch" people in the same and did a good business. It was no wonder that the patronage was excellent, for they billed the reel like a house a-fire, with three sheets and special lithos, and they caught the eye and then the dimes. This feature was only here for one day and many regretted that it didn't stay longer. It was one of the most worthy specials that we have seen in these parts for a long time.

Another picture that attracted a great deal of attention was the Vitagraph's half reel concerning President Taft, his Cabinet and the United States Senate. Taft is popular in moving pictures, judging by the interest manifested whenever there is a picture of him announced, and the one last week was no exception.

If Wild West took up some of the time, we still had a patriotic feature in the last rites of the battleship Maine, which is booked for the New Central Theatre, and while we have not as yet actually beheld this reel, we feel sure, judging from what the others on this subject have been, that this one will not prove a failure.

In my last week's letter I believe I called attention to the desire of local interests to get one of the moving picture companies to come to Hot Springs. Well, I am pleased to state in this one that the idea has taken root and is being watched with great care. The local press has taken the matter up and have commented on it editorially. The people here feel, to be brief, that their happiness would be complete if there was a company from one of the studios in or about the city.

The high water and floods in and about the Missippippi valley have delayed more than one vaudeville act, and films being shipped from St. Louis have been late. The situation is even worse out of Memphis, where the danger is even greater.

If some of the moving picture cameras were on the job, here would be a chance for some great material, and it goes without saying that the films would draw great all through the Mississippi valley. I expect, before very long, to see the advertisements of the great flood pictures the same as those that were heralded when Paris was under water. Reports that reach Hot Springs are very discouraging. The patrons who are here and who live in the vicinity of the flooded district, which includes at this writing a large area of the South, cannot go home, and those who are there, in case they desired to do so, cannot come here. It will hurt the summer business of this resort, but moving picture managers and other business interests should be thankful that it didn't come at the height of the winter season, for that would have seriously affected prosperity.

Did you ever sit down to write a letter when every bone in your body ached and the galloping pains of "grippe" galloped and did a "Salome glide" through your system? Well, Mr. Editor and readers of this column, that is the condition of your humble servant as he pounds his typewriter this evening. For the past three days I have been keeping on my feet and at my work simply through will power, but I am inclined to-night to crack will on the noodle and take a two days' rest in the alfalfa. Yours merrily caught a severe cold a few days ago, and this is the result. I really think that it is up to me to emulate the signature of these letters and be in reality "The Man in the Baths" and get some of this boiled out of my system, for at present writing I am about as agreeable as a small-pox patient.

Saw the Biograph reel, "A Siren of Impulse," and enjoyed it greatly. Very clever little leading lady in that reel. I always like the Biograph character types. They are faithful and every detail seems looked after. Of course, once in a great while they slip up on something—but who doesn't? The Selig reel, "The Ones Who Suffer," was a decided treat and I noted that many women did not hesitate to bring out their handkerchiefs when this was on at the New Central.

Tuesday, provided I am feeling any better than I do now, I intend to go to Little Rock, the capital of the glorious commonwealth of Arkansas, and shall look about for some "dope" there. The Little Rock Lodge of Moose sent me an invitation to make an address and I accepted. I have several friends in the moving picture industry in Little Rock and shall make it my business to call on them, and next week hope to let the readers of the Moving Picture News know just what Little Rock has in this respect. Until then, au revoir.

THE MAN IN THE BATHS.

IMP RELEASES

The up-to-date Imp release of April 22d, "A Millionaire for a Day," is permeated with the New York atmosphere. Fred Dudley, legacy in hand, dashes up to New York in a "special," and proceeds to paper Broadway with the long green. Dear heart! how he throws it away; ten spots galore to a bootblack; lunch at the Astor; a special performance at a theatre; a touch of gambling; a little dance; a row with a magistrate, and so home to Wilkes-Barre, absolutely broke and repentant. Glad after his experiences of a day as a millionaire to get down to his labor again.

"The Loan Shark," Imp release for April 25th, is the story of a "loan shark's" tyranny and its subsequent result—the forcing, under harassing circumstances, of a poor old man to steal in order to pay a debt, and later on, to contemplate self destruction, and also the murder of his daughter. The salvation is effected by the daughter's sweetheart. Very interesting in outline and plot.

"A Piece of Ambergris," is a comedy whose atmosphere is redolent of the sea—sea-going men and their environment. The play is full of rich humor. J. R. Cumpson makes something of a departure in the character of the captain, harrassed by debt and oppressed by an unattractive widow whom he marries. Rolinda Bainbridge is exceedingly droll in the part of the scheming widow.

NESTOR RELEASES

One of the finest Nestor releases which has appeared for some time is that one entitled, "Her Indian Hero." The Indian characters though they are taken by white people are remarkably well played, especially the part of the young Indian hero. The story is a love tale of rather an extraordinary type, wherein is shown a white girl falling in love with a young Indian who has been sent to college and educated. All other men appear such pigmies to her by the side of the noble "red-blood," until in a dream he comes to her arrayed in his primitive Indian part, combating with and mortally wounding her fiancee. She awakens with a start to find that her scream of alarm have brought to her side not only her sweetheart but the young Indian in dress suit, silk hat, etc., who has been invited to the house by her father. She falls in her lover's embrace, and with the realization that the young girl is not to be his dawning on him the red man is last seen descending the steps of her home, tearing in pieces the card which she has previously given him, containing her name and address.

The story is good and most commendable in the conception of the Indian nature, displayed by the actors taking Indian parts.

Other fine Nestors for release in the near future are, "A Pair of Baby Shoes" and "The Lone Trail," both of excellent calibre.

On Sunday afternoon, April 7, I attended the meeting of Local 35, I. A. T. S. E., and was cordially received. As it was the first meeting I attended at their new rooms in the Weeona Club, No. 409 West Forty-seventh street, I was agreeably surprised to see them entrenched in such snug quarters. The rooms are fitted up more like a throne room in a castle than a meeting room of a labor union. The walls are tastefully done in red and gold with heavy carpeted floors and every modern convenience, while the rostrum is on an elevated platform with two heavy brass standing lamps on either side of the chairman. The desks of the secretary, treasurer and recording secretary are of massive mahogany, with an adjustable brass electrical fixture affording plenty of light for their clerical duties.

The arrangement committee's report on the ball was read, and it proved to be a grand success, both from a social and financial standpoint.

They were discharged with a vote of thanks and a rousing cheer by the entire body. Frank McGee and John Carey were obligated by Chairman Stephens and elected members of the Local. Following is a list of officers:

Arthur Brady, the hustling proprietor of the Brady Sign and Poster Company, reports business very good. It is easy to verify his statement as he can be found in his shop at the Manhattan Slide Company until 10:30 any night. Mr. White, who owns and conducts the supply department of the Manhattan Slide Company, is also doing a land office business in the crush. Saturday one of his large show cases containing parts for machines, etc., was broken, but trifles like that don't bother my congenial friend White.

Brother Herman Kelpan is certainly kept busy these days at the Precision Machine Company, the manufacturers of the Simplex machine. He has to inspect each machine before it leaves the factory, and quoting his own words: "On the level, Tom, if they shoot the orders at me any faster I won't need any more Turkish baths," but Brother Harry Mockler, the salesman for the firm, only smiles and looks at his growing bank account and his big diamond ring and soothes Brother Kelpan's feelings with an invitation to Bristol's for supper.

Brother Sidney Buehr and Sam Kaplan have joined the forces of the Stage Hand Publishing Company as co-editors of the Moving Picture Page. Best wishes for your success in the field of journalism is extended by James and I, and we will expect big things from your pen in the near future.

In my rambles about town I stopped in a house in 125th street. They were running frst-run pictures and nothing can be said about the projection as the operator kept his picture sharp with a clean aperture plate and ran the picture with life-like motion, and would increase and diminish his speed as called for. The picture, a Pathé weekly for a finishing subject, had a big fire scene, but the drummer and piano player played the same monotonous waltz that they started the picture with. The picture fell flat and did not get a hand, and as it was projected faultlessly, it was a shame more attention was not paid by the drummer to working his effects instead of watching those who came and went through the door in the rear of the house.

Walking into Ganes' Manhattan Theatre, I saw the same picture, and when it came to that fire scene it sounded as if the whole New York Fire Department was on the job. The pumping of the engines, the falling of the walls, and the swish of the water as it hit the hot sides of the building, was faithfully portrayed. The uneasy stamp of the horses, the clanging of bells, and the blowing of whistles had the audience on the edge, as the 250 odd feet was projected, and at the finish the audience responded with a hand that would make a Broadway star envious.

I sought an introduction to the drummer and found his name was Arthur Fasig. I complimented him on his good work, and during our conversation he told me he only worked up the pictures that he really thought needed effects. He said a little well done is better than a lot of noise, and I certainly agree with him.

Some effect men that I have worked with would invariably catch a fall after the actor had fallen down and was about to arise, and would run an auto or train effect after the train or auto had stopped.

There is nothing better than well run effects to make a picture interesting, coupled with good projection, but I would suggest if you have a four-reel show, work the effects in one reel and do it right. So take a tip, Harlem. You are a good man with traps, but in the future don't try to work every picture, but put ginger in the one you do work up.

I had the extreme pleasure of being introduced to Mr. N. H. Spitzer the congenial representative of the American Theatre Curtain & Supply Company, of St. Louis, manufacturers of the Radium Gold Fibre screen. A screen that has many advantages over any screen on the market at the present time. I am afraid to undertake to describe the screen, afraid that I cannot do it justice, but a personal visit to Mr. Spitzer, who has all the characteristics of the West, a breezy and interesting talker, a man that has devoted the best years of his life to theatrical enterprises. Mr. Spitzer was formerly manager of the Imp Theatre, Seattle, Wash., and until recently states selling agent for Pendleton Round Up pictures, and being a man of keen observation, he saw the great possibilities of the Radium Gold Fibre screen, having been a pioneer in the picture field, he had used most every screen on the market, but when he saw a demonstration of the Radium Gold Fibre screen, and as it was still unknown in the growing field of picturedom, he made arrangements to drop everything and make the Radium Gold Fibre screen a by-word among patrons, exhibitors and operators throughout the country. His confidence was not misplaced as the R. G. F. screen jumped into public favor by leaps and bounds; he has only been in New York for one week and has sold a screen to the Orpheum Theatre, Second avenue and Eighth street, and to Mr. Levy, who owns and operates a circuit of houses in New York and Atlantic City. Mr. Levy is an old-timer at the moving picture game, and as he knows the projection game from A to Z, he told Mr. Spitzer, "You came from Missouri but the New York exhibitor has to be shown." Well, to make a long story short, when he saw a picture projected 100 feet with the consumption of 15 amperes he was pleasantly surprised, and when he observed the picture with the doors wide open the astonishment was written all over his countenance. He ordered a screen at once for his Atlantic City airdrome. Sun, water exposure or nothing, in fact, has any effect on the Radium Gold Fibre screen, so it can be used in the airdrome as easily as in an enclosed theatre. This is only one of the many points of advantage offered by the American Theatre Curtain Co., and as they have a five-story building, situated at Main and Chestnut streets, St. Louis, Mo., devoted to the exclusive manufacture of the Radium Gold Fibre screen, it is ample proof that they can meet and convince the most skeptical, but seeing is believing in this age of competition, and as I cannot do justice to the manufacturer or to Mr. Spitzer or give the exhibitor or operator all the advantages of the Radium Gold Fibre screen. But let Mr. Spitzer or one of his able assistants explain and demonstrate it at his New York office, 105 East Fourteenth street. He has several salesmen well known to the New York trade associated with him.

Brothers Klapholz, Maltz and Levitch have proved conclusively that operating is not such a bad game, as they have invested in motorcycles and can be seen breaking the speed laws every day in the vicinity of Fourteenth street. Brother Teddy Greenberg had a joy ride with Brother Abe Levitch Tuesday, and if the Department of Water, Gas and Electricity had the regulating of the speed laws both brothers would have lost their cards.

Met Brother George P. Goodfellow Tuesday evening in Hoboken and had a nice long chat with him about his Local (Auxiliary Branch No. 4, Buffalo) and he told me that business is very good in Buffalo at present, and also says that the Union is very strong. He says that at their meeting and clubrooms, 271 Washington street, they have a gymnasium, a buffet, and plenty of other amusements for the members to enjoy themselves in their spare time. Brother Goodfellow is out for all the repair work he can get in New Jersey and will sell supplies to the needy. He has a patent on a new device which he says will soon be on the market. It is an adjustable spot and flood apparatus that can be attached to any machine.

AN ASSISTED ELOPEMENT

By Virginia West

(Adapted from American Release)

ONE thing parents never seem to learn is that opposition is the greatest developer of love. They see it in other people's children, but when it comes to their own they are as blind as the proverbial bat.

The opportunity had come to Mrs. Smith to prove herself an exception to the rule, but this opportunity, like many another, went unembraced.

Jack Collins was a fine young fellow, but he was "only a mechanic," and therefore, in Mrs. Smith's eyes, not good enough for her daughter Bessie. She must have a professional man.

So when Bert Bruce, a well-to-do young lawyer, began calling on Bessie Mrs. Smith was greatly pleased.

However, Bessie's opinion and her mother's did not coincide. So it was the same old story—the more the mother urged the one man, the more stronger grew the girl's love for the other.

As the spring grew into summer Bessie and Jack began to meet secretly. Many times she returned from a stroll along shaded paths with Jack to find Bert Bruce being most graciously entertained by her mother.

Frequently she had to go for a spin with the young lawyer, but she always insisted upon her mother accompanying them. Consequently Bruce had very little opportunity of speaking his heart to the girl.

Even though Jack Collins knew that Bessie loved him and cared not a whit for other men, after the way of lovers he didn't like her giving any time to another—especially his rival—and was impatient for the day when he could claim her for his own before all the world.

One evening, when they were walking in a little wood at twilight, Jack said: "Bessie, I know that your mother will never give her consent to our marriage. She treats me more coldly each time she sees me."

"Oh, Jack, it's a shame! I don't see why mother acts so. She might know it won't do any good."

Quickly Jack put his arms around her and drew her close. "You do really love me, then?" he asked.

"You know it."

For a moment the young man paused. Then he spoke very softly:

"Don't let us wait any longer, dear. We love each other and your mother will never consent."

"You mean——"

The girl stopped and looked at Jack with wide-questioning eyes. Her hands pressed his a little closer.

"Yes," he said almost pleadingly. "Yes, I mean that I want you to promise me to-morrow. Won't you, Bessie, sweetheart? There is no reason why we should not. We are both old enough; they can't stop us."

So eagerly had the young lover pleaded that no sooner had he finished than Bessie's arms were about his neck.

"I'm terribly timid about eloping, Jack, but I'll do it for your sake. I can't give you up and I won't—not for mother nor anybody else."

So, holding each other by the hands, they strolled among the trees and planned their future.

The next afternoon Jack, with his heart beating rapidly beneath the precious document that was to make Bessie his wife, entered his shop with so smiling a countenance that the foreman called out: "Look at the Candy Kid with the Quaker-Oats smile!" Then he added: "Say, Collins, jump on your wheel and run over to La Mesa, will you? There's a 'phone call from there that a touring car has turned turtle on the outskirts of the town."

In the twinkling of an eye Jack had his tools and was peddling away.

"Say, if you turn that smile on the machine you won't need any tools," the foreman called after him.

Jack continued to smile from time to time, patting his coat pocket lovingly as he did so.

It was necessary for Jack to pass through the town in order to reach the disabled machine, which lay on the other side of it. Just as he was going through a short stretch of road he was greatly surprised to be suddenly stopped by a policeman.

"Now, me boy, what is it you've got in your bag?" he asked.

"I don't see that you have any call to stop me on the road and ask me such a question," said Jack half angrily. "And, besides, I should think you'd know what was in it if you had any eyes."

"Sure, I think it's tools," said the officer in a tone of great significance.

"Right you are. Now you might guess what kind they are and I'll go on." Jack was getting impatient.

"Not so fast, not so fast. You think you can fool me, but I've caught too many of your kind. Hand over that bag." The tone this time had the ring of authority.

Jack smiled a little sarcastically and handed over the bag.

After a hasty survey of the contents of the bag the policeman exclaimed in a tone not unmixed with pride: "You're arrested! I'm glad I've got you at last. We'll put you now where you'll not break into any more houses."

Jack stared in mutual astonishment.

"But, say," continued the officer, "I do admire your nerve, ridin' through the country in broad daylight—and your tools with you, too."

"For heaven's sake, what's the matter with you?" exclaimed Jack. "Can't you see those are not burglar's tools? I'm going to fix a machine on the other side of the town."

The Irishman shook his head. "Well, you can explain all that very nicely to his honor. I'll give you a chance in a very short time—in a very short time."

"But——" began Jack in dismay.

"There is no buts."

The policeman mounted his own wheel and rode along at Jack's side, with his hand on his prisoner's arm.

"Well, what is it—what's the trouble?" asked the judge, looking searchingly over his glasses at Jack.

"Why, your Honor——"

"Wait a minute, young man. Your turn will come."

"But I thought you meant me."

"Never mind what you thought!" This time the tone was severe. "Officer, what is this man charged with?"

"I arrested him as a suspicious character, your Honor."

"Of what do you suspect him?"

"Burglaries, your Honor." He rolled the word around in his mouth as a delicious morsel.

"I tell you it's ridic——" broke in Jack, but was quickly silenced by a look from the judge.

"What makes you suspect this man, officer?"

"Well, your Honor, I caught 'im in a secluded spot outside the town and he had his tools with 'im. And there's been a mighty lot o' burglaries goin' on around this town lately."

The judge turned to the prisoner.

"Can you prove your innocence?"

The question was asked so suddenly that Jack felt almost guilty.

"I—why—the tools are mechanic's tools. I was going to fix an automobile. I—I'm perfectly respectable, your Honor."

"Better lock him up, Officer. I have some important cases now. I'll hear him later."

More important cases! Could there be a more important case, when he had a marriage license in his pocket and Bessie was waiting for him to elope with her tonight? Jack thought certainly not.

His heart sank steadily towards his boots. Then suddenly it gave a bound. He'd send the officer over to Bert Bruce. Surely Bruce would be willing to identify him even though they were rivals. And Bruce was prominent.

Jack felt in his trousers pocket. There was one lonesome bill. He was afraid to draw it out for fear it would not be large enough for a temptation.

When the door of the cell was thrown open Jack gained courage enough—or became desperate enough to draw forth the bill. He almost gave a cry of joy. It was five dollars.

"Do you think that would make it worth your while to pedal over and ask Attorney Bertram Bruce to identify me?" asked Jack with a great attempt at carelessness.

The policeman laid his hand over the bill. "Where does he live?" he asked.

When Bruce was discovered he was just entering his automobile, which stood in front of his office. He turned as he heard his name.

"We got a man who calls himself Jack Collins over here at the La Mesa station house. He wants you to come over and identify him," explained the officer.

"What's he there for?" Bruce spoke quickly and almost with hope. Could he prove that Jack was unfit for Bessie?

"I 'lowed he was a burglar, but he insists he ain't."

Bruce's mind worked very quickly and the temptation that came to him was too strong. Leaning toward the policeman he said in a confidential tone: "I don't know anybody by that name. Take my advice and keep him where you've got him. He's probably a desperate character."

The officer's face beamed. "That's just what I told the judge, sir. I guess I know a burglar when I see 'im. 'Specially when he's got his traps with 'em."

"Well, I'm glad you made no mistake, officer," said Bruce as he started his machine in the direction of Bessie's home.

Mrs. Smith would be more than delighted to go for a spin. But Bessie felt differently. With many delightful flutterings of the heart she was secretly packing a bag.

The girl made all manner of excuses: it was too hot; she had work to do; she had a headache.

"The breeze will be cool and will do your head good," insisted her mother.

Urged until she was afraid to refuse any longer for fear of arousing suspicion, Bessie finally consented to go.

Bruce purposely took the road to La Mesa. If it were only possible to see Jack Collins looking through bars! So excited was he that the absurdity of the thought never struck him.

So anxious was he to reach the town that he forgot to slacken his speed.

Suddenly a sharp command was given by a mounted policeman. Bruce paid no attention. Not until a shot was fired into the air did he realize that he was an idiot not to stop.

"You're arrested," he heard spoken from behind him, and he knew resistance was of no use.

When Bruce and Bessie entered the courtroom they stopped short. Then Bruce took a step backward and Bessie took a step forward.

"Jack," cried the girl, regardless of the place and the people, "what are you doing here?" She had gone straight up to the rail.

The judge's eye, looking over his glasses, fell upon her and she became confused.

"Young lady, do you know this man?" were the words that fell upon her just-then very pink ears.

"Oh, yes, sir," she exclaimed vehemently, looking up at the judge with wide, wondering eyes.

"Is he—has he——" It was the judge's turn to become confused under the straightforward gaze of the girl.

"What are those tools he carries?" he finally asked.

"Oh, those are the tools and things he uses to fix automobiles and things with."

"You will swear to that and that he is an honest young man?"

"Indeed, yes! That's why I like him." The girl stopped again.

In the meanwhile Bruce had caught sight of the officer to whom he had denied knowing Jack Collins. A hurriedly whispered conversation and the slipping of a bill from one hand to another made Bruce feel safe. There was but one thing to do now, he thought, so he did it.

Stepping up beside Bessie, he said: "What the young lady said is true, your Honor. You know me, I think."

"Why, yes. You're Mr. Bruce, aren't you?"

"Yes, your Honor."

"And you know this young man?"

"Yes, your Honor. There has been a mistake. He is a mechanic and perfectly honest."

The judge thanked him and turned to Jack.

"I regret this very much, sir; very much indeed. I hope you'll be able to overlook it.

"It's all right, your Honor, but there is one little favor I should like to ask of you," Jack answered.

"Certainly, certainly, sir."

Jack laid before the justice his marriage license.

"You mean—this is——" He looked toward Bessie.

"Yes, I was going to use it a little later, but this is better. Is it all right, Bessie?"

She nodded and put her hand in his.

A twinkle came into Jack's eyes. He looked at Bruce and said, "This young man will gladly be a witness."

Bruce looked as if he could eat everybody in the courtroom, but he said nothing.

The form was quickly gone through and Jack and Bessie were soon man and wife.

"Now," said Jack, turning to Bruce, "if you'll be kind enough to lend me a little money, please. I haven't a cent in my pocket."

Bruce silently handed him ten dollars. Then while Jack and Bessie whispered in a corner he paid his own fine.

"We had better go to mamma now," suggested Bessie sweetly. "She might be getting anxious and wondering what's become of us."

"Yes, she might," growled Bruce.

"This is my husband, mamma," said Bessie when they had reached the automobile.

"Your——"

Mrs. Smith gasped.

"What are you saying?"

"Jack and I were just married. That's what took us so long. Mr. Bruce was a witness, so he can tell you all about it.

"Child, have you lost your mind? Mr. Bruce, is she telling the truth?" A look at Bruce's face did not reassure her.

"There, you get in front with Mr. Bruce and he'll tell you about it," said Bessie in the same sweet voice. "Come, Jack, we'll get in the back seat and take our honeymoon trip."

Jack caught the girl's mood. He grinned and climbed into the car beside her.

"Tell me the whole thing, for heaven's sake, Mr. Bruce!" pleaded poor Mrs. Smith.

Chug, chug, chug, chug!

"I can't now, madame; the car makes too much noise," he replied.

EDUCATIONAL FILMS

Written for the Moving Picture News by Louise Chadwick, Author of America's Story for America's Children, etc.

In the early stage of the moving picture the general public looked upon a moving picture show as common and probably immoral. This stage, the moving picture has lived through and has come up out of. At worst, the moving picture film of to-day is un-moral and the question arises: How soon will public opinion develop further, and the moving picture take the place that awaits it among the most valuable and uplifting entertainments of the century?

Being only recently interested in the moving picture world that has unfolded before the eyes of us, the busy people of the school room, we shall hardly assume to answer this question; but being asked by the editor of the "News" to express our ideas of moving pictures from the standpoint of the teacher, we are glad to tell what we know and to submit whatever ideas we have to the moving picture world.

What, from the standpoint of a teacher, is an educational film; what do teachers wish to see upon the screen; what would they consider worth while and why?—these are the questions that we are asked to consider.

First, let us investigate the needs of the primary children. These children enjoy and need "funny" pictures, to be sure; and no sane educator would debar them, for children have a very keen though crude notion of "fun" and the grotesque; therefore, let the clean, funny picture remain.

On the other hand, these young children need animal stories that shall point strong moral lessons; animal stories that shall teach that animals have thoughts and feelings; stories that shall arouse pity and sympathy for dumb creatures. Again, these children, impressionable as they are at the primary age, need stories of simple heroism, biographical stories of strong men and women; fairy tales, legends and folk lore. And this recalls to our mind a fairy tale that we recently saw thrown upon the screen. It was the story of "Jack and the Bean Stalk"—a fairy tale dear to the heart of every child. The story opened prettily with the mother finding that her cupboard was bare and appealing to Jack for help and comfort. The setting was beautiful, making one think somewhat of Peter Pan. Jack climbing the vine was most artistic; and the fairy that welcomed Jack into cloudland was a perfect creation. When, however, the giant was thrown upon the screen, one shuddered. We have little sympathy for a certain group of educators who, in their desire to spare the child, would emasculate every story; take out its vigor and modify its every feature of force and strength; but the giant in this moving picture was repugnant, indelicate, repulsive. Had he been monstrous and terrible it would have been right and fitting; but this giant was repulsive. The nose was horribly formed, making one think of those "cauliflower noses" that one reads of in medical books and which now and then one meets on the street. It was loathsome. And then, when the giant fell from the vine, he fell in such a way as to lie across two-thirds of the foreground of the picture and the repulsive face with its cauliflower nose lay turned toward the audience.

Now this photo-play was not immoral; it inculcated no criminal lesson; it suggested evil in no form whatever; and yet it defied every law of child study and pedagogy that the school world knows. The picture was indelicate; it was coarse and this need not have been had it, in its film making stage, been censored by some one conversant with child study theories and with the accepted standards for children's pictures. The giant had a right to be monstrous and even terrible; but he need not have been loathsome.

We notice that the film makers call always, if we may judge from what the moving picture magazines and the schools that teach scenario writing say, for original themes. This is well; but for subject matter for juvenile films, there is a wealth of legends and folk lore, charmingly constructed tales, and with which the children of this country are almost wholly unfamiliar. This wealth of material may well be utilized in film making for children. Indeed, the juvenile film maker has an inexhaustible well from which to draw. Such a film maker would require no original scenario writers, but an editor conversant with this wealth of child lore and capable of arranging and editing the material as it now exists, often only in mere record form.

* * * *

Let us now consider the needs of the grammar school child. He studies history, geography, he reads the lives of great men and women; his general knowledge is far broader than any one not conversant with the public school of to-day and not in immediate touch with children realizes. Therefore, here is again a great fund of incident and anecdote from which to draw in making films for the children of these grades. Here again, the need for original plots is nil, for here again we have an inexhaustible fund from which to draw. There are hundreds of anecdotes hidden away in history—anecdotes that awaken and thrill and awe the child; so many, in fact, that wonder is why there need be any call for original themes in planning scenarios for children.

* * * *

We come now to a consideration of the pupil of High School grade. Here again is a field almost untouched as yet. World history comes now into play, and again an inexhaustible supply of anecdote and incident reveals itself to the scenario student who begins to investigate his opportunities.

The moving picture show might be particularly useful to the High School pupil if applied to the High School course of study. For example, some months ago the "Tale of Two Cities" was advertised by a showman of a certain town. Now the "Tale of Two Cities" is a book that many universities require to have been read by candidates for admission to entrance examinations; and any university would accept it as an equivalent. Accordingly, the literature teachers of the school called the attention of the pupils to this advertised photo-play and advised them one and all to attend the exhibition. As a result, the school engaged the hall for a certain session and attended the show in a body. So we see that the appearance of a valuable photo-play is not only tolerated by the teachers' world, but is welcomed. Might it not, then, pay a moving picture showman to present more often pictures of this grade of value.

Nor would the so-called lower classes be defrauded of pleasure if plays of this grade predominated. It is a mistake to think that an ignorant person hasn't in him instinctively some appreciation of the good. That even the "slum people" have appreciation in no small degree has been too amply proved by social workers to need defense at our hands. They may not get out of the "Tale of Two Cities" what the trained High School pupil or the literary professor gets; but human nature is at its foundations the same, and to scenes which portray the human heart are interpreted pretty nearly the same by all classes of people.

* * * *

We have been interested lately in examining a certain lecture which is largely advertised, purporting to explain a certain film and which is recommended to photo-play lecturers as an interpretation of the great poem which it accompanies. In reading this printed lecture, however, one could but be struck with the paucity of intelligence shown in its preparation; there could have been no real knowledge on the part of the compiler of the real significance of the poem. The compiler had evidently tried to bring the poem to the people and to popularize it; but in doing so he had done what many a novitiate in the writing of children's stories does—he had stripped the story of all that is best in it, under the delusion that writing for immature minds means writing condescendingly and weakly and ignoring the real spirit of the story under consideration. The writer of this lecture had evidently made the same mistake; he had written with the supposition that his audience would not understand and would be contented with a merely superficial interpretation, demanding nothing of the thing that had originally made the poem a classic.

Now judging from years of experience as a writer for children, we should say that this compiler had reasoned most erroneously. The great poem from which the lecture was deduced is one that abounds in symbolism and in references hidden to great characters in history, to myths and to folk tale personages. Many, many myths and legends are hidden in the lines and references to statesmen and literary men dead and gone long before. None of these, however, does the printed lecture bring out; nor does it suggest even that such significance lies hidden behind the words of the poem. This was, we think, a grave error; for every one, young and old, educated and uneducated, loves an anecdote and a story within a story. This, one may notice at an Elmendorf lecture. However beautiful Mr. Elmendorf's pictures, the audience is never so wrapt, the hall never so silent as when he diverges a little and stops to tell a legend or a personal anecdote.

Now it chanced that this photo-play was given in a certain town and was advertised by the showman as a strong educational photo-play. Accordingly, on the opening afternoon, a group of intelligent club women engaged a section of the theatre, thinking to gain a reasonable knowledge of this great work which educated people are supposed to be familiar with.

One member of the group had taken a course in the sapalysis of this poem while at college, and so was alive to every good and bad point in the presentation. When the play was over and the women were conferring upon the merits of the exhibition, the college woman expressed her disappointment. "I realize," said she, "that time is limited for the presentation of so great a photo-play, but the compiler of the lecture, to my mind, imparted no impulse to the audience; he touched on no vital point; he gave no hint of the hidden meaning or symbolism. There was positively, after all, nothing educative in the play, for the pictures without explanation of their symbolism were nothing but pictures—exaggerated and unreal."

The other women asked for an explanation of just what she meant, and the point that we would make, is this, that the woman in less time than the lecturer had consumed, knowing so well the deeper significance of the poem, gave an outline so clear, so stimulating, so illuminating, that it gave an impetus, as one might say, that brought about the formation of a class which lasted througout the winter.

Now we give this incident as an illustration of what might be done educationally if the larger opportunities for using classic, historic, geographical and literary material were seized upon by the film makers and intelligently elaborated by the showmen and lecturers.

The showmen will perhaps say, "We are in this thing for money, and there are more people who like indifferent film subjects than who like classics; therefore, we cater to the greater demand." That is good "business," we admit; still, is it not possible that the showman reckons without real knowledge of human nature when he assumes that the mass of people would care nothing for the stimulation that comes from seeing a good thing; and is it not possible, too, that if the showman's collection were of higher grade a higher grade of people would throng his hall. Certainly the showman that produced the "Tale of Two Cities" and secured the attendance of some seven or eight hundred High School pupils must have done a good stroke of business on the day that the High School pupils came in a body. If there were more exhibitions of good and valuable subjects, more and more people of a higher grade would attend. Perhaps in the end the showman would be as successful as if he held to commonplace film stories only.

One can express the sentiments of "us teachers" no more forcibly than by quoting a certain Grammar School principal when he said recently, "If I had money, I would install a moving picture show of my own; I would engage a hall, make my own films and advertise that every picture presented should be of educational specific value."

But to secure films of specific educational value from the standpoint of the teachers, the film maker would need to confer with some practical teacher who would be in close touch with the concrete needs of the schoolroom, some one who has an inborn sympathy with the child and who understands the underlying principles of all story writing for children, namely, that the action that must stamp a scenario, must also stamp the successful story for children. It is the final test of the value of the story. To write a child's story or to write a juvenile scenario may not require deep and scholarly research, but it is by no means an easy thing to do unless one has the divine gift for the work. There must be a born sympathy with the child's viewpoint—a sympathy that cannot be defined and which cannot, perhaps, be cultivated. Moreover, only one who has the inborn sympathy for the child, is fitted to cull and select material for juvenile scenarios. Not always the most salient points in a story appeal to a child, but rather those embodying the greatest activity. Action is the keynote to successful composition for youth, be it in the form of printed story or picture-play.

We once submitted a history story to four hundred children, asking them to make drawings of those parts of the story which they would like to see illustrated when the story should appear in print. Now it was the story of Balboa—his escape from his enemies in a barrel, his long and terrible explorations and his final discovery of the Pacific. Knowing how children love the ludicrous and especially situations where somebody "fools" somebody, we thought the children would choose the barrel scene. To our amazement, not one child chose it. All chose points in which action predominated, the favorite illustration being that of Balboa signalling his men to come up the mountain and look upon the ocean that he had discovered. We submit here one of these drawings—crude, to be sure, but expressive and certainly indicative of the child's love for action, action, action.

This is an honest expression of the "best part of the story," given as the child's own testimony.

* * * *

To summarize, then, we teachers would like films that bear upon the schoolroom work—geography, history, biography and science. We would welcome scholarly, though brief expositions of classics of all kinds. We would like the films to be planned, and censored, perchance by some one who knows the schoolroom intimately and who knows more intimately still the heart of the child; who would quickly detect the false note, and who would sense the difference between action and rough house, between fun and vulgarity, between the truly grotesque and the repulsive.

To an exhibition, Mr. Showman, giving us films that bear upon our schoolroom world of work, films that are in sympathy with the demands of the child mind, we teachers would come gladly, bringing with us our entire flocks, only too glad to seize upon an opportunity to educate the children through their eyes, which, after all, is the only true way to educate any child, or any immature mind, be it young or old in year's calendar.

The following item in connection with children and the moving picture theater question is interesting:

Says Mrs. Harry C. Arthur, organizer of the Practical Mothers' Association of Greater New York, and who is the mother of ten children:

"If a New York mother with a big family of children doesn't know a lot about reforming things, who does?"

The Practical Mothers are preparing a bill for the Legislature, amending the law as to moving picture shows. One of the features of the measure is a provision requiring that a special period—2.30 to 7.30 p.m.—be set apart for the attendance of children, and that they be seated in a certain part of the house, with incline-plane exits in place of steps.

"If I had my way," said Mrs. Arthur, "I would not permit any child to attend a moving picture show at night. Our Legislative bill will compel the show managers to put on educational pictures for the children. Something will have to be done in the way of amending the laws relating to these places. The present law against the admission of unattended children cannot be enforced."

The Chicago Federation of Labor has also given voice to an opinion that bears repeating:

"It is better for such neglected children to attend the nickel shows, which are so carefully censored by the city authorities, than to congregate at street corners or find their way into saloons or cheap dance halls. There also is the added danger that the children restricted from attending theatres without their parents may be emboldened to ask strangers to escort them there."

BEDELIA AS A MOTHER-IN-LAW

CAST

Bedelia .....Tony O'Sullivan
Bedelia's daughter .....Jane Fearnley
The daughter's husband.....James Cooley

Bedelia writes a letter to her daughter to tell her that she is coming on a visit and to look for her within the next few days; upon her arrival she is greeted profusely by her daughter, but gets a very sad welcome from her son-in-law. She proceeds to make life unbearable for him and he in turn takes it out on his wife. It finally gets to a point where the worm turns. He schemes to send mother back home by paying all his attention to her and entirely overlooking his wife. He showers her with flowers, candy and new hats, something he had not done for his wife in ages. Naturally his wife resents it. The culmination of the whole affair comes after Bedelia and her son-in-law have spent the evening at a fashionable restaurant. Bedelia comes home much the worse for wear. The next morning the angry wife brings her Mother Bedelia her hat, coat and baggage and sends her on her way—home.

On the same reel will be found a natural history subject entitled "The Pigmy Circus." This is an exceptionally interesting and novel series of untrained little animals in their natural antics.

DRAMA AND FASHION IN FILM

Combining a dramatic story and the 1912 spring and summer fashions in a film, is the latest Thanhouser achievement. An idea of the story end may be found in the title, "The Saleslady," and of the fashion part in that announcement that real models "show" with real Worth, Paquin, Louise and Redfern creations. There are all the tailored morning costumes, afternoon gowns, reception frocks, dinner gowns and opera wraps that have been accepted by society for wear this spring and summer. The women should go into spasms over this novel film.

ADVANCE DEMAND FOR "CRY OF CHILDREN"

Independent booking exchanges report an unusual advance demand for "The Cry of the Children," the Thanhouser child-labor feature, especially in sections where there are factories. The subject is said to deal as boldly with the child-labor problem as the original poem by Elizabeth Barrett Browning. Thanhouser announces that a real factory was converted into a film studio to give the film accurate "local color." The production is in two reels; Tuesday April 30th.

NEW ROCHELLE "SPREADS" ITSELF

The big film factory at New Rochelle is turning out fine work these days. The releases for Tuesday, April 23, and Friday, April 26, are especially noteworthy. The first of these, "Rejuvenation," was produced by the Florida

Thanhouser stock, the other, "When Mandy Came to Town," by the home one. Both are of a dramatic order. "Rejuvenation" is what its title indicates, the story of a man's effort to redeem himself. Mandy's father in "When Mandy Came to Town," owned the village opry house and booked in a burlesque troupe, the star of which dazzled him. He even left his wife and little Mandy to be with the troupe, but then Mandy came to town and the mere sight of her brought him back to his home.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

RELY ON RELIANCE

George W. Terwilliger, Scenario Editor of the Reliance Company, comes to bat with a proposition which should be appreciated by every script writer. Mr. Terwilliger's statement has been used in part in the Moving Picture News, but we deem it of such importance that a more extended mention is made. In a recent letter to the editor of the department, Mr. Terwilliger writes:

"I have enjoyed your scenario page for so long that I cannot resist the temptation to let you know there is a little progress being manifested among scenario editors as well as the rest of the moving picture business. The new form letter which other concerns are taking so much credit for, we have had in operation for many months past, together with suggestions to scenario writers as per enclosure. You mention $35 as the top-notch price for scenarios, but we make the statement that we are paying from $25 to $75 for superior dramatic material. I think we are the first company to consistently encourage the scenario writer, for not only have we been giving him reasons for rejection, but paying the best prices. Now we are going to give him credit. Our pictures now being produced will carry the name of the scenario author along with the main title. Whether he is well known, or an amateur, he will get credit."

Writers will appreciate Mr. Terwilliger's system, both the financial and crediting details. He is a man of his word, and Reliance will certainly profit by getting a large share of the first readings.

Every rejection slip now being used by Reliance has the reason for the script's rejection checked thereon. Suggestions for writers are also furnished gratis and the novice can save good money by reading them carefully, instead of paying tuition to so-called "schools" and "associations." Here they are:

We cannot use scenarios of Western, Indian or foreign character except where the locale can be changed to Eastern without injuring the strength of the situations and plot.

We cannot use comedy, "costume" or trick pictures.

The impossible and improbable as well as adaptations from copyrighted stories, books or plays should not be submitted.

What we desire most are intense emotional stories of American life replete with strong, vital, dramatic situations. Novelty and originality in both theme and situation are requisite factors to be considered.

Have the characters and the unfolding of the plot logical and consistent. The plot should not be so involved as to need numerous sub-titles. Simple stories are always best.

Bear in mind that no dialogue can be employed in the interpretation of the story. Action alone must carry it. Have your manuscripts typewritten if possible, and head your detailed scenes with the synopsis of the story.

Stamps must be enclosed and addresses written plainly to insure prompt and safe return.

Immediate consideration given all manuscripts. Do not let the return of one or many manuscripts deter you from sending us others. They are simply not suited to our purposes and their return does not qualify them as being absolutely valueless.

A CHEAP EDUCATION

If J. C. Young, of Saginaw, Mich., will enclose a stamped self-addressed envelope to Lubin, Reliance, Eclair and Essanay scenario departments, he will receive form sheets and suggestion blanks which, if carefully studied, will furnish him about as much information anent scenario writing as any "correspondence school" can furnish him. This answer will also apply to several other queries on the same subject.

READ THE EDITORIAL

A significant editorial was published on the copyright question in the Saturday Evening Post of Thursday, March 21. The Post objects indirectly to the move of certain moving picture manufacturers in having the copyright law changed in their behalf. Reading between the lines, one can gather the fact that the Saturday Evening Post does not propose to have its back files culled by ambitious authors for plots. We advise all script writers to read the editorial for its attitude and advise a very small minority of writers to read it in order to save themselves future trouble.

WATCH MISS VAN BUSKIRK

Keep your eye on Miss Van Buskirk, ye script writers who submit work to the Powers Motion Picture Company. Miss Van Buskirk has been engaged by Editor Giles R. Warren as his assistant, and her bright eyes will in all probability scan your stories before they are passed on to Mr. Warren for final consideration. The fact that

MISS VAN BUSKIRK, ASSISTANT TO EDITOR WARREN OF POWERS CO.

Editor Warren has secured the services of Miss Van Buskirk signifies in itself that she is some "sharp" at detecting the merits and demerits of scripts.

This lady rendered Mr. Warren valuable assistance at his home office while he was editor for the Imp, and when his services were demanded by Mr. Powers, Mr. Warren was fortunate in again securing her able co-operation.

Miss Van Buskirk is one of those versatile young ladies who can take a great deal of the routine work from the hands of the hard-worked editor and can detect a plot "swiped" from the popular magazine even before the envelope is fairly opened. More power to Miss Van Buskirk. She does not pose as a "Lady Scenario Editor" but she is qualified, just the same.

A WORD FROM MR. MERENESS

It is with pleasure that we use the following letter from Mr. Matt Mereness, of Schoharie, N. Y. His letter shows the true spirit; there isn't a word in it about "plotstealing," "organizing for mutual benefit" and such rot. It is published for the benefit of other writers and proves what hard work and optimism will do. Come again, Mr. Mereness, and bring some of your friends. The letter:

"As to my personal experience at scenario writing, after being in the business a little over a year, I've had some, and then some.

"In January, 1911, I saw an ad of Vitagraph in the Saturday Evening Post, over a year old, for moving picture plays. Answering, I received an information paper and sample scenario. These are the only points I ever had. Writing a Western drama, I submitted it to Vitagraph. It was gone three days before it came back. But a nice personal letter accompanied it, and I will say here that Vitagraph has always treated me fine and I have some very nice letters from them.

"My first scenario was accepted by the Champion Company and was entitled: 'As Things Used to Be.' The acceptance shows that I had talent and encouraged me a good deal. I wrote another and sent it also to Champion. It was entitled: 'A Daughter of Dixie,' a military drama. This also was accepted. So the first two scenarios I ever wrote were accepted. This was in April and May, 1911.

"In May I got a position to operate a moving picture machine, which I did, thinking I could make more money, study the pictures, and get next to the business. I worked until October, when I again went to writing. Since October 24, Kalem, alone, has taken five scripts. I always try to submit my work to companies which give me a pointer as to the reason why it is returned. Kalem was always good about this, also Vitagraph, Essanay and Lubin. When a story comes back with 'Too Unpleasant,' 'Old Idea,' 'Idea Used Before,' it helps you to avoid the same mistake the second time. Rex also has a nice way of rejecting a scenario, not using a printed form but typing a personal letter.

"I have tried all kinds of stories. Knowing the demand for comedy, I wrote several and found that something new is caught up quickly. I have had good luck with military drama, getting in several with one company just when they desired military stuff. Drama you can send to almost any company, also comedy.

"I have been discouraged many times; getting as many as three stories back in a day is pretty discouraging for a beginner. Then I would write another, and so I have kept on until I have learned a great deal.

"I do not think much of writer's schools. I have found out from experience. If you have the brains to think out your plot, write it down in scenario form, send it to some concern, and if you show any talent, they know it and you will know it. Keep up in the picture game and read the scenario page in the Moving Picture News. It has helped me and will help anyone who is in the scenario world. Later I will try and tell some more of my experiences," concluded Mr. Mereness.

WILLIAM LORD WRIGHT.

FUNNY THINGS THAT HAPPEN IN THE STUDIO

A rather funny incident happened in the Lubin studio a few days ago. To understand the joke it must be stated that the structure, with the exception of one brick wall is made entirely of glass and steel. It is upwards of 100 feet high and as big as a first-class theatre. There are many swinging windows which are often open and scores of sparrows fly in and gossip on the rods that support the building; sparrows are noted for being fresh and absolutely indifferent to people. A photo-play called "Rice and Old Shoes," was being staged for the camera. Jack Halliday and May Buckley were playing the leading roles, which described an excellent couple, through misunderstanding, just on the verge of being divorced; the couple had promised to attend a wedding of the wife's sister and for appearance sake attended. As the wedding guests were leaving the house a little girl in a spirit of mischief poured a handful of rice on the soon to be divorced wife's hat. It travelled home and when the lady removed her hat the rice trickled down on the carpet. Being left alone the husband looked at the rice and it reminded him of a wedding five years ago. He buried his face in his hands and threw every gesture of sorrow and regret into his acting. Removing the hands from his face he saw three or four sparrows on the carpet pecking at the grains of rice. The camera was working and Halliday tried hard to continue the scene, but in a few seconds exploded as a score of lookers on burst out laughing. It it not recorded what Halliday said, however, of course, the picture was spoiled and had to be taken over again.

AMERICAN TO RELEASE REMARKABLE SUBJECT

"Her Mountain Home" is the title of a very able piece of work that will be released by the American Film Mfg. Company on Thursday, April 25. It is a distinctly odd subject. The opening pictures show a wide and cheerless expanse of dry, barren alkali desert. Immediately in the foreground, with face painfully lined and every evidence of intense suffering, lying flat on the ground, we see a man in the throes of death by thirst. Suddenly his nervously working hand closes on a pebble, when lo! the magic thought "Gold!" changes the dying man's expression and lights it with a ghastly ray of hope. Such is the power of gold.

He is rescued and later we see him and a chum join in the rush for the new gold field. In that motley crowd we see the roung adventurers of the West, coarse women, mingling into the homogenous types of humanity, that follow in the wake of gold. The hurried packing, restive horses attached to prairie schooners, the populace hurrying hither and thither with newly obtained claim deeds, all serve to make a striking portrayal of that most interesting of Western events—the rush of gold!

Philadelphia, Pa.—J. Johnke and Thomas J. Mooney are having plans prepared for a moving picture theatre at Germantown and Hunting Park avenues.

Los Angeles, Cal.—John Wagner is building a moving picture theatre on Central avenue near Jefferson.

NOTES OF THE WEEK

NOTES OF THE WEEK

NO truer axiom was ever spoken than that one so well known to all of us, immortalized in the text-books of school days, "Where there's a will there's a way."

Let them rebel who may at Sunday motion picture shows, there is bound to be devised by the ingenious mind some plan to overcome all obstacles placed in the way of the exhibitor by the "goodie goodies." Already the Western brain has commenced work on the problem, and as a result the moving picture shows of Colfax, Wash., will open Sunday nights with prayer and sacred songs, after which the regular moving picture show will be continued. This is done in order to evade the closing ordinance.

What charity gains by the opening of cinematograph shows on Sundays has now been ascertained by a statement issued by the London County Council. The scheme by which such places may be opened on condition that the profits are devoted to charity has been in operation for six months, during which period the sum of $31,960 has been handed over in the way of profit to charities. There are 198 picture palaces open under this arrangement. The gross receipts were $278,010, which indicates that the people spend about $10,000 every Sunday in this form of amusement. The total expenditure was $246,045, of which $60,395 went in wages.

During a recruiting campaign held by the officers and men of the 74th Infantry, at Buffalo, N. Y., moving pictures of army life in all parts of the world were flashed upon the screen and the many prospective recruits were able to gain from the scenes depicted a good idea of just what they would be called upon to do when called into service.

Old ships that have gone down to the sea on their last voyage need not rest in the "boneyard" longer. They can be money-makers without the necessity of seeking a charter or the trouble of hunting a crew out of a dozen sailors' boarding-houses; and they need not put to sea at all, or, if they do, only for a day's voyage on the Pacific main in the company of a tug.

The ancient bark Alden Besse has saved herself from the fate of being converted into a coal hulk or condemned to disuse forever. To-day she is the most sought after ship in Southern waters. The motion picture concerns all want her.

Already the still stately old windjammer has borne the brunt of half a dozen "piratical" attacks by "sea rovers" of the most savage mien. Her decks have been the scene of sanguinary battles for lovely women and a half dozen "commanders" have bravely walked the plank and been quickly rescued by San Pedro boatmen with an eye to business.

There is a rumor on foot to the effect E. M. Sothern and Julia Marlowe are considering a proposition to furnish a film of a condensed version of "The Taming of the Shrew."

Girls employed by the Magnetic Poster Company and the General Film Company, located on the second floor of the building at the southeast corner of Seventh avenue and Walnut street, Cincinnati, Ohio, refused to become panic-stricken a few days ago, when a cry of fire was raised. Instead, they formed a bucket brigade and, without the leadership of any man, extinguished a blaze which had broken out in the office of the Magnetic Company before fireman reached the scene.

Another incident of finding trace of a long lost relative in a moving picture occurred not long ago in San Diego, when Robert Fielding, supposed to have been buried beneath a landslide in Southern Sinoala some fifteen years ago, recognized his brother, Romaine Fielding, one of the Lubin stars, in a film of Lubin manufacture.

There was a letter addressed in care of the Lubin Company and a speedy reply in telegram form, then later a renewal of former brotherly relations. Still there was a note of sadness in the meeting, for mother and father had passed away in the interval and there were but two orphans left to rejoice.

Among the films shown at the children's matinee at the Oakland Theatre, Oakland, Cal., was one entitled "The Electric Spark," illustrating some experiments made with this wonderful mysterious force. This picture was explained by Ellery Stone, a young amateur wireless operator. The children were delighted with the entertainment, and we have no doubt that the efforts on behalf of these Oakland little ones will leave its impress in an improved adult life in the future.

Says Chas. Frohman: "Moving pictures are not to be decried any more than yellow journalism. Each is a force for progress in its own way. People who never came to the theatre at all because they had no sense for drama or comedy, now have a little from watching moving pictures. People who never thought at all are now induced to think a little by the aid of yellow journalism. And just as the small boy gradually graduates from the dime novel to the novel that is literature, so, too, patrons of moving pictures and readers of yellow journals cannot help finding such food insufficient for long, and, with that discovery, demanding better things."

The Vatican officials recently refused an offer of 2,000,000 lira (approximately $400,000) by moving picture men for the privilege of taking "movies" of the Pope receiving Easter pilgrims.

The recent amendment of the Townsend Copyright bill provides that where there is innocent infringement of undramatized or non-dramatic works by motion picture makers the damages shall not exceed $100, and in case of innocent infringement of copyrighted dramatic or dramatic-musical works by makers of motion pictures the damages shall not exceed $5,000.

But innocence must be proven to the satisfaction of the court in such cases. These exceptions are not to deprive the copyright proprietor of any other remedy given him under the copyright law nor shall the limitation as to the amount of recovery for innocent infringement apply to infringements which may occur after notice has been served that an action is to be started for the recovery of the stated damages. In order that foreign nations may form some adequate idea of what a large plant the Bethlehem Steel Company is, Charles M. Schwab has hit upon a plan practically to bring the enormous plant to the very doors of those countries. In the past few days he has had moving picture men at work taking pictures of every department, every building and the thousands of men as they leave the works.

Representative Thayer, in discussing the bill before the House Judiciary Committee, used the motion picture business as an illustration of how the patent monopoly operates. He said the companies controlling the cameras licensed certain manufacturers to sell films to certain theatres that had taken out licenses granted by the owners of the patents. Although the films were not patented the cameras used in taking the films were patented and by this means the theatres were restricted from using any other films.

After the Motion Picture Patents Company was organized in February, 1909, and took over practically all of the competing manufacturers, reels of motion pictures were leased for periods of only seven weeks for a price greater than that for which they were formerly sold. The revenue of the Patents Company was said to exceed $1,000,000 a year.

Says the Boston, Mass., Morning Globe, and wisely, regarding the filming of scenes illustrative of the Hillsville, Va., assassination:

If a rigid censorship of moving picture films is ever desirable or necessary, it would seem to be imperative in the case of the films made to show how the frightful tragedy occurred in the courthouse at Hillsville, Va., last week. An enterprising moving picture firm—whether in or out of the Trust does not matter—sent men and machines to the place the other day and re-enacted in bloodless manner the scenes of the crime for the sake of exhibition.

Those films cannot possibly serve any useful purpose. They will be neither instructive nor enlightening. They cannot fail to shock the sense of every civilized man and woman. Their only influence will be demoralizing, and probably even dangerous for susceptible minds.

Many people are puzzled by the endless variety of illusions to be seen at a moving picture hall. Quite a common picture is the airship rising rapidly in the clouds; but few know how this effect is procured.

The airship is really a tiny model suspended on a thread in front of a canvas painted to represent clouds. This sheet is attached to two rollers, one of which has a handle. When the handle is turned to the left or right the sheet moves up or down. The cinematograph camera is placed in position and started; at the same time the sheet is wound downward, the airship remaining stationary on its thread.

The picture thus obtained when produced gives a realistic representation of a monster airship rising rapidly in the clouds. If a picture is required of an airship falling to earth the roller is reversed to wind the sheet upward.

Improvements amounting to about $3,000 are now in course of construction at the Alhambra Moving Picture Theatre, Fifth avenue, north. This is one of the largest moving picture shows in the South and is owned by the Crescent Amusement Company, of Nashville, which owns fourteen other show places in the large cities of the South.

The entire building is now being gone over by a large force of painters and decorators in charge of C. Howell, of Nashville, an expert theatre decorator. The color scheme will be white, gold and grey, with gold leaf decorations. A new indirect lighting system is also being installed and the screen for the pictures will be of a light golden effect that will not flicker or hurt the eyes.

This theater will be what is known as a daylight moving picture theatre.

More than a hundred picture machine operators attended.

A determined effort is to be made by business men of Falls street, Niagara Falls, to resist the Sunday closing of the theatres and moving picture houses. They take their stand on the assumption that if the Sunday theatre is eliminated all other business enterprises that do a Sunday business will be interfered with. To formulate a plan of action a meeting of the business men of the street was held at the Imperial Hotel, Friday, March 29, and resolutions were adopted vigorously protesting against the action of the clergy and agreeing to engage the services of two attorneys to apper before the Common Council at its next meeting and oppose the adoption of such an ordinance as is desired by the clergy.

It is understood that the Board of Police Commissioners stand ready to close up everything if the ordinance in regard to the Sunday theatre is placed on the statute books. They will close the bazars, the cigar stores, etc., and also stop all Sunday ball playing.

Says the Atlantic City, N. J., Press:

Governor Wilson has signed the Richards' bill which gives Council in this city the authority to regulate moving picture theatres and license the operators. The bill is an enabling measure of the right sort and marks a big step in the direction of safeguarding human life. Its only weak point is the fact that the age limit of operators is fixed at 18 years. It seems to us that a man not old enough to handle a ballot is not old enough to handle dangerous films where human lives are at stak .

A moving picture camera man was detected taking a "film" of the chorus and show girls in "Over the River" as they came out of the stage door of the Globe Theatre after the Wednesday matinee.

"What for?" demanded Manager Burbage fiercely; "some of those nickel shacks down the avenue?"

"Naw," confidentially explained the camera man, "this fillum is for a big excursion agency out West; additional inducement to Rube farmers and merchants to come to New York to buy goods and see the sights at the same time. Now will you be good?"

"Certain educational forms came in for sharp criticism from one of the speakers at a meeting of the Michigan Academy of Sciences," says the Toledo Blade.

"The study of the classics in our schools and colleges," he said, "has, through 'dry-as-dust,' antiquated and impracticable methods of instruction, become, at the present time, an almost inappreciable element in our system of education. It would be a sad day if, in the not distant future, our methods of scientific instruction should likewise be weighed in the balance and found wanting."

Enters now Prof. Thomas A. Edison. The schoolroom is darkened. Moving pictures are thrown upon the screen. Here we have the full chronicle of the siege of Troy—a beautiful, exciting picture story, vivid and beyond forgetting; Homer is no longer "dry as dust." No wet towels necessary now to keep the Iliad from anæstheticizing the student. The picture changes. It is an Amazonian forest. Strange birds fly among plants of incredible variety. Insects crawl and leap. Perhaps a large animal, driven by beaters, comes leaping into the screen, pauses a second and is gone. Natural history is a different thing now from the droning recitation upon flower fertilization and the anatomy of the crawfish. So the pictures move—showing a ballroom at Versailles, with figures of Louis XIV. and his courtiers, showing the discharge of a cargo from the Indies in the Albert Docks of London, showing the processes in a steel mill, showing the life history of a butterfly from the egg to imago.

If education is weighed in the balance and found wanting after Prof. Edison's promised revolution, it will be because boys and girls are become suddenly a race of muddleheads.

The following is interesting, from a biographical sketch of Dr. Coleman Sellers, pioneer of motion photography, by the late Dr. Henry Morton, President of Stevens Institute of Technology:

"In 1861 Doctor Sellers made and patented a device which he called the kinematoscope for the exhibition of stereoscopic pictures of objects in motion, which, in point of fact, was the crude prototype of the modern machines for displaying moving objects, such as the biographs, kinetoscope and others. The machine accomplished the object intended in a practical manner, but required for its full development instantaneous photography, which had not at that time been invented. . . . The operation to be reproduced was divided into a suitable number of parts, the subject being posed for each part of the movement. As many seconds were required for each pose with the slow plates then used, great care was necessary on the part of the operator and model to get perfect registration of the successive views. The result, however, was quite successful in portraying such simple repeated movements as a boy driving a nail or a lady sewing."

One of the things which marks a new attitude toward amusements, is the fact that the Russell Sage Foundation has gone into the moving picture business. It has entered the field in this sense: It has produced a set of films which are designed to show the good which is accomplished by social centers. This particular set of films show the fall and the redemption of one Charlie Brown, who goes from good to worse and then comes back to the good, all through the various influences which are brought to bear on him.

There was a time, when amusements were considered bad, by those who felt responsibility for public morals. Later, there came the movement to cut out of these public pleasures anything which could be shown to be positively harmful to the persons attending it. Now, has come a movement which strives to make amusements positive forces instead of negative ones. There can be no doubt that most of the picture shows are fairly clean pleasures, but they might be made forces for betterment. This attempt, on the part of the Sage Foundation, deserves commendation. The life of the rising generation is far more influenced by what they see on the films than most people realize. It is a field for conquest.

The perfection of the moving picture machine, like that of practically every other kind of complicated device, was arrived at through many stages of invention. Leonardo da Vinci, in the fifteenth century, called attention to the theory of duration of visible impressions, upon which is based all of the various inventions for representing moving objects. An instrument called the phenakistoscope was invented by Dr. Roget and improved by Plateau in 1829, which consisted of a circular disc, bearing a circular series of objects, mounted on a handle to revolve. The figures following each other showed consecutively a gradual progression or change in position. Similar old-fashioned toys, which came on the market from time to time, such as the thaumotrope, invented by Sir John Hershel; zoetrope, stroboscope and others, all illustrate the same principle, and were the logical forerunners of the now popular moving picture machines. Edison's kinetoscope, patented 1893, was the first successful attempt to elaborate the idea. In the projecting of pictures on a screen it was found difficult to devise a means to keep the ribbon with its views with a figure a sufficient length of time between the lights and the lens, and to cause an instantaneous shift to the next view. C. F. Jenkins, in 1894, devised a means for accomplishing this, his apparatus being among the first, if not the first. Motion pictures were shown in foreign countries in 1895 and were first exhibited publicly in Philadelphia, Pa., in the summer of 1896 at Keith's Bijou Theatre, on Eighth street, above Race.

On the average of about 150,000 feet of film are placed on the British market every week, and this quantity is steadily increasing. It is computed that there are some 50,000 picture theatres scattered throughout the world, and as the number thereof is increasing daily, the supply of films has by no means yet reached the limits of the demand.

A PAIR OF BABY SHOES

"A Pair of Baby Shoes" is a touching little drama of modern life. Just another case of the pleasure-loving husband forgetting his duty to his wife and child and only realizing, after many months of anguish for his wife, how thoughtless and selfish he had been. One beautiful scene in this picture shows the exterior of their beautiful home, long after midnight. An automobile looms into view, and we see the young husband alighting unsteadily from the car, bidding the remaining occupants adieu, and entering his home where his neglected wife sits, heart-broken over the loss of her baby, which has been her one consolation, and now Death had snatched that from her.

The chain of circumstances which lead to the return of the little shoes to the parents of the baby is very interesting. Some of the finest acting is done by Mr. Russell Bassett, who portrays the character of the faithful butler who, so anxious to effect a reconsiliation between the young couple, at last sees a chance to do so. The husband and wife have mutually agreed to hereafter live their lives apart and to go their own ways but when, on the morning of their parting, each discovers a tiny shoe in their respective bags, both feel that bond of union so strongly that they decide that a pair of baby shoes was a silent reminder of the "tie that binds."

This remarkable dramatic gem will be released by the Nestor Film Company, Monday, April 15.

GEORGE KLEINE HAS GOOD RELEASES

George Kleine, importer of Cines and Urban-Eclipse films, has for release on April 16, 17 and 20 the following releases which bear relation to these dates i nthe order in which they come:

"How They Lost Out," a mighty amusing Cines comedy reel of about 1,000 feet. The fun centers around three sisters who quarrel with their sweethearts and in consequence send them notes announcing the breaking of their engagements. Meantime a cousin of the girls, a young lady who has had financial reverses, is obliged to accept the position of maid at their home, shortly after which George Pickard, a desirable and wealthy young man, arrives for a visit. The girls elated, make elaborate preparations. The young man wishing to ascertain the sincerity of the sisters tells them that he has lost his fortune, upon which the girls no longer interested, ask him to take his meals in the kitchen for the remainder of his visit. Pickard is agreeable and soon finds himself tete-a-tete with the charming cousin. The climax of the story comes when after leaving the home of the sisters he writes them to say that he is still in possession of his wealth which he will 'ere long share with his bride-to-be, who, it turns out is the cousin whom they employed as maid. The chagrin of the sisters can easily be imagined, and will be much enjoyed by the audience.

"The Unknown Traveler," is a highly interesting and intensely dramatic Eclipse drama, also about 1,000 feet in length. The costuming and natural scenery utilized in the setting of this photo-play make it worthy of comment apart from any other attribute. The locale of the story which is laid among the humble fisher-folk, is the picturesque coast of France.

Louis, a brave sailor lad, about to leave on a long voyage to the Newfoundland fishing banks, is presented with a scapular by his sweetheart Jean, who is the inn-keeper's daughter. As the months go by nothing is heard from Louis save a report that his boat and crew were lost. Several years later an unknown traveler comes to the inn for lodging. On retiring for the night he gives his belt, which is filled with gold, to the old man. The inn-keeper is enamoured by so much money, and is only prevented from stealing it by the intervention of his daughter. When the stranger appears next morning Jean returns him the money and on doing so catches sight of the scapular about his neck. Studying him more closely she at last recognizes him in spite of his disguise.

The story works out well, has splendid situations and is most beautifully staged.

"Queen Elizabeth's Ring," is a fine historical photoplay, enacted by the Cines Company. The story is based almost entirely on genuine historical data, and the costuming and scenic investiture of the period has been correctly carried out. According to the film story Queen Elizabeth presents her favorite, Lord Leigh, with a ring, stating that if ever he should turn against her or conspire with her enemies, or should be at any time in trouble, he should send the ring back to her, and she would aid him. The Countess of Southerville, a lady-in-waiting to the Queen, conceives a strong liking for Lord Leigh, but he repulses her advances and amuses himself with Bessy, a poor lady's maid of the court. The Countess, in pique, determines to seek revenge, and learning of the secret love affair of Lord Leigh, sends word to him that she intends informing the Queen. Fearing Her Majesty's displeasure, he impetuously joins in a conspiracy against her life, but is discovered, arrested and thrown into prison. There he recalls the Queen's promise and sends a courtier to deliver the ring to the Queen, but unfortunately it falls into the hands of the jealous Countess who revengefully conceals it. Soon afterwards, the Countess repenting of her action places the ring where the Queen discovers it, but it is now too late, Lord Leigh has paid for his treason with his head.

BEAUTY, APOLLO AND THE BEAST

Whether love is blind or cross-eyed or near-sighted is a question that will last longer than any language in which it can be asked. Generally the answer is a vague gathering of vocabulary that sounds like an omelette and means nothing. The only apparent answer is the question in our hearts, and when you answer a question with a question it is a self-evident truth that you know twice as little as you did before.

Which brings us to the conclusion that love is more or less, mostly more, of a puzzle. "Love is like a red, red rose that blooms and blows in June," one of the song hits of a recent musical comedy has it; "love is like a brook that flows, and each heart knows the tune." Very sweetly and poetically related, and the simile a very cute one, but just to illustrate how many things and how few things love is like, we would like to ask the writer of the lyric in question whether love is like a red, red rose any more than it is like a red, red nose. No, love is a puzzle the answer to which has not been suggested by all the thousands of years.

An unusual story of unusual love is told in "Beauty and the Beast," the Rex release for Thursday, April 18th. She was the beauty of the season, he was a beast for looks, and obeying the law of contrast, she married him. He had a friend, a handsome chap, and Beauty met him. The rest of the story is the crash of love's doom and the clash of souls. After the long, black, hopeless night the dawn breaks—and with it, Apollo's heart. Throughout the story the men are never anything but men, and the woman only a woman. There is no attempt to paint them in false colors, or lie about the truth. The story is life, the scenes the world, and the moral our souls.

"Beauty and the Beast" is a drama worthy the stagecraft, skill, human understanding, and throughout all, the genial genius of a Belasco. It is another and a distinct Rex triumph.

THE PENSIONERS

(Released by American Film Mfg. Co., Monday, April 29—Western Drama)

Charles Bramwell, aged sixty-five, was a retired army officer bearing the rank of captain. Now in his old age he had nothing on which to live save his quarterly pension—and living was high in California.

But the captain had two sons—Dick, quick, clear-thinking, a popular young fellow with both men and women; and Will, slower witted, careless, lazy and indifferent.

One day a message came while the captain sat under the trees in his yard and playfully fondled his sword, reminiscent of by-gone days. The message was short and addressed from a legal firm in the East. It read: "As per the last will and testament of your late friend, Col. W. A. Reiggs, we are sending to your care his two daughters in accordance with your understanding."

The daughters arrived. Clarice proved haughty, indifferent to others and quarrelsome. Madge, on the contrary, soon showed herself a kind and thoughtful girl and in many ways the direct antithesis of her sister. Curiously enough, Dick found himself drawn strongly toward Clarice. They spooned together beneath the fine old trees, went on long jaunts, and generally became so immersed with themselves that they entirely forgot the other members of the family.

But a change was coming over Will. He no longer neglected to carry water, bring the firewood, and do the chores about the house. There grew up a comradeship between him and Madge, brought about, no doubt, through the fact that all the household work was thrown upon their shoulders.

Then a day came when neither Clarice nor Dick could be found. Finally, the aged mother discovered a note which explained the mad infatuation and brought the sorrowful news that the family could expect nothing more from Dick or Clarice. But Will, with one arm about his mother's shoulder and the other caressingly thrown around Madge, assured her that the black sheep had turned white and that thenceforth he would assume his brother's place.

OUR LONDON LETTER

London, March 25th.—We eagerly await the return of Mr. Chas. Urban in this country and his own confirmation of the rumors which have gained currency here anent a new "Kinemacolor" theatre for our city. You, Cousin America, will 'ere now have shared our own delights in witnessing the historic pictures of our King's visit to India, which indeed, are destined to still further exalt the name of "Kinemacolor" in the film world, and also that of its indefatigable inventor. The exhibition of these records on two continents within so short a time, indeed marks a progressive step in the science of cinematography.

The present year has been a notable one for the British producer. It certainly looks, at the moment, that exhibitors are speedily to come into their own. The quality of the subjects show a decided improvement and the output is daily increasing. The houses of Cricks & Martin, British & Colonial, Hipworth & Clarendon are responsible for this satisfactory condition of affairs.

The number of theatres in the metropolis is ever on the increase and I am glad to say the general appearance and management of the newer halls show an improvement. The era of the "converted shop" is past. I hear that at King's Cross, Pykes Circuit are prospecting for yet another house in this neighborhood. This company's watchword is obviously "Progress!" The advance in the matter of educational cinematography is indeed slow. The authorities appear to require a deal of convincing in this connection. I have endeavored to drive this matter home in a little work Messrs. Ganes, Ltd., the proprietors of The Bioscope, are shortly publishing for me, entitled, "The Cinematograph and Natural Science." I notice the motion picture is to supplement the geography lessons in the Columbus schools, Kansas. The English Board of Education has been considering the advisability of taking similar steps, but as yet nothing has matured, but all those who have the more serious phases of cinematography at heart eagerly await the time when we may once again follow your lead. There appears to be a deplorable lack of initiative on this side in such matters as these! Far more attention is being devoted to the question of film censorship in this country at the moment. You see we are dealing with these momentous matters slowly; and it is to be hoped surely.

It is refreshing to find that the theatrical profession have some nice things to say in favor of the picture theatre. As will be gathered from my article under the head of "Side Lights on the Cinematograph," the community as a whole is proving itself to be particularly "broad-minded" in this matter. I hope the feeling on your side is equally satisfactory.

LEONARD DONALDSON.

BEAUTY AND THE BEAST
Rex Release, April 18

Romance and love—mystery is their name. Dawn and a red rose, twilight and violets; a whisper of night and a taste of the noon; the lilt of a song and a mocking echo; a moan and groan, and the shout of victory and despair; virile life and the weak moment before death—these are romance. We say so, and we ask "What is it?" For a question is the answer. It's poetry—that's it; but there's more rhyme to it than reason.

She was beautiful—beautiful in italics. Her eyes were the koh-i-noor, her hair a wealth of golden colors, a mass of soft, strong fetters that bound the hearts of men and made their minds dream and hunger and hope and despair. Her face was fate for men, her soul their destiny. Pardon our being so mushy, but—God, she was beautiful!

He was homely, so homely; homelier than the word betrays. Hopelessly homely, so homely that he was ludicrous. He had a man's heart and hands and hopes, but—gee, he was homely!

They met, as tides meet in the sea and paths on earth and ways in life. She may have been amused or amazed, surprised or startled, or merely curious in a woman's way; she may have been attracted through the mystic law of contrast, or something else that we can only describe by "something else"—but she was drawn to him. Don't ask us why—ask life, and life can't be interviewed.

She was beautiful, as beautiful as a fresh, fragrant flower singing in spring's wilderness. And her eyes sang a siren song to the homely man.

Yes, we are rather convinced it was the law of contrast. It may have been just a little of life—we often think life is a contradiction. Rex philosophy! But listen, they married. The newspapers called them "Beauty and the Beast." Perhaps it hurt his masculinity a little; we are certain it pleased her.

Then things changed a little bit. She was a woman, a young woman, a beautiful young woman, who know it; and he had a handsome friend. He noticed that she was tired, and he left her free. His friend was handsome, a god of a man. And we humans are mighty weak.

He ran for office, lived in the fight to forget, but the scandal cost him the election. So he forgot God.

A long, long time afterwards, as time is measured by suffering, he received a note from his friend asking for forgiveness. Those who cannot forget forgive, so he joined his friend and together they found riches, but missed happiness.

He read a personal in a newspaper one day, and this was the message: "Will beast forgive beauty, and come back to her and the baby?"

Did he go back? Well—love's a mighty funny proposition!

WHILE WEDDING BELLS RING OUT
Rex Release, April 21

The language of love is a complex jargon. No one understands exactly what it says, but every one thinks he has the true interpretation. We fulfill its commands and demands without knowing what they are. Prate about subconscious personality, chatter about the secret ego and other such like matters; Cupid stands back in the wings and giggles at the passing play on life's stage. We could go on until the very last line of this little synopsis talking about love—and say nothing. But we don't intend to do so. We merely intend to tell a story, a story of love, two women's love—one for a man, and one for the other woman. There are two men in the story, too, now that we think of it; but the women's love is the more important factor in the tale.

She was just a little stenographer, and the son of her employer took a liking to her. It was an adventure to call on a poor girl, and he loved adventure. At her home he met her sister—she was the other woman.

Let's call them Marion and Ethel, just to distinguish them. Not to get personal, Marion was a better prize than the other, but the wealthy boy was a kid, and his life and the life about him had been so superficial and artificial that he saw only what lay on the surface, and on the surface the other was more desirable. Both women loved him, you know, and one was due to make the sacrifice. That one—you've guessed it—was Marion.

Take a minute off, and try to imagine the cost to a woman who loves. Pessimistic about humanity, are you? Rather cynical as to whether there is any good in the world? ather doubtful of the existence of angels just because there are so many little devils all about us? Well, unless your opinion is a prejudice, the following will change it.

Remember our telling you they were poor girls? Well, Marion wanted her sister to dress as became the sweetheart of a wealthy man. There is no doubt in our minds that she would have chosen an honest way of obtaining the money if it was presented to her, but it wasn't, so the devil won. She took the money from the safe.

The girl looked beautiful in the fine clothes, and in the other's joy Marion forgot how they were obtained. But she was reminded. Meantime, the marriage date was set.

Bad things sometimes happen the very worst time. The theft was disclosed on the very day of the wedding. She pleaded with the detective not to tell the sordid truth until after the ceremony. And for some strange reason (very strange for a detective) he promised. Might have been her eyes, glistening with the wee drop of a tear.

There's an end to everything, including the story and this synopsis—a happy end. What do you think, it was found that the boy's father, her employer, was in love with her.

Pep, we agree with you—God made a funny world!

JIMMIE, THE BOLD BUCCANEER
Gaumont Release, May 9

Little Jimmie's parents are leaving for Morocco with an expedition party intent on surveying the proposed railway connecting Fez to Tangiers, but the little youngster is left at home. The departure of his folks for the African shore is deeply taken to heart by him, so that he does nothing but think, talk, read and study Morocco. In fact, he can't sleep on account of thinking so much of Morocco, and finally decamps one silent moonlit night in a tiny launch to cross the vast Mediterranean to the African continent. After much water suffering, the bold juvenile buccaneer sights African soil. After landing he surveys toward the interior with his telescope and descries a dusky, dark, Ethiopian camp of native Moroccans. Watching his opportunity, he holds up a young native just his size and confiscates his garments. To make his disguise still more perfect Jimmie is forced to blacken his face with a pigment he had thoughtfully brought from the European side. Of course, he's bright enough to present himself as a dumb negro and further ingratiates himself to the tribe by getting them drunk. At this point his telescope reveals a caravan in peril of a marauding attack; he leaps to the field of action with a lone cannon, turns himself artillery man and routs the enemy. Of course, the travellers thank the little hero, and much to their mutual surprise Jimmie recognizes his mother and father in the party he rescued. You bet they are proud of their baby boy, and shower a rain of kisses on him, even though the dusky makeup soils their own faces.

U. S. ARTILLERY MANOEUVRES

Imp Release, April 27

It is not commonly known that the United States possesses a National Guard of a quarter of a million men, always maintained in a high state of efficiency. It is very much the fashion, especially in Europe, to taunt Uncle Sam with having no fighting material in comparison with European standards. Still European critics will he interested to learn that this country, if unlike France, Germany, Russia and Austria, has not a vast military camp, yet has a good force of fighting material available should occasion ever arise.

In this picture there are shown the skilful manœuvres of the U. S. A. Artillery, always a popular theme with moving picture audiences. The machine-like precision of the drill and movements have been perfectly caught by the lens of the camera, and the result is a series of striking tableaux of military interest.

A picture such as this should do much toward encouraging a patriotic feeling in the minds of the hundreds of thousands who see it. The photography is excellent.

On the same reel:

A PIECE OF AMBERGRIS

A common trait of the uncultivated mind is the mistaking of hase metals for gold. In other words, in assuming that an article, having an attractive appearance, is valuahle, when in reality it is not. A connoissuer, that is, the man who knows, is rarer in a community than is usually supposed. Not everybody can detect a genuine old master from a spurious one, and the homes of the poor are full of fake objects of virtu and other things that are not so good as they seem.

So that Captain Binks, when he read in the newspapers that a chunk ot amhergris had been accidentally found by a workman, could be excused for losing his head when, in the course of his love-making with a laundry woman, he fell into the mistake of supposing that a strange mass of manufactured soap, which he by chance discovered on the lady's premises, must be amhergris. Ambergris was in the air; it was discoverable, and to he discovered, and Captain Binks fell for his temptation.

So, as his ship was under mortgage and he had not the money to ward off the disaster, he married the widow, who was delighted to become the wife of a sea captain.

Of course, the amhergris is stolen; it is recovered hy Binks, after a series of amusing adventures on land and sea, hut lo! and hehold, when he attempts to realize upon the precious substance an expert quickly undeceives him as to its real value.

So Binks goes from bad to worse; he is still in debt in regard to his ship; he is wedded to a very unattractive laundry woman, and he has no money.

All because of fundamental ignorance of the real value of a misleading mass of soap.

A PAIR OF BABY SHOES
Nestor Release, April 15th

On returning home from their individual evening's entertainment Mr. and Mrs. Richard Darrell, an estranged couple, arrive in time to be present at the death bed of their only child. The sole tie that held them beneath the same roof is broken. The doctor and an old servant are the only other persons present when the child goes into the Great Beyond. Its little boots are forcibly brought to our notice.

With no mortal tie on earth, the Darrells follow to the fullest extent the bent of their own desires; clubs and wines for Richard; society and companionship of other men for Flora. They become almost detestable to each other, and it is only through the intervention of the old servant that the husband is prevented from striking his wife while in a fit of rage.

The baby boots, long since thrown away as valueless, eventually find their way to a rubbish can; it is here that they are again observed by the old doctor. From the rubbish can the boots go into the bag of a rag picker; thence into the possession of a junk man who sells them to a second-hand shoe dealer. The tiny boots are placed in the window for display. By a strange chance, they are bought by a couple of jolly inebriates, bent on burning up the town.

Mr. and Mrs. Darrell have their last quarrel, and divorce proceedings are the inevitable outcome.

Next door to where the child died there is a wedding in progress. Old shoes and rice are thrown after the bride and groom. The two inebriates coming upon the scene, join in the sport of shoe throwing by contributing the baby boots. Among the old shoes and boots that litter the street, the old servant finds and recognizes the baby boots—the wife is off to Reno and the husband is going to Europe. They meet for the last time. By an ingenious arrangement of their dead child's shoes (the old butler puts one little shoe in each of their traveling bags), a reconciliation is brought about at the eleventh hour.

HER INDIAN HERO
Nestor Release, April 17

The Chief's son, Silver Water, returns from college, and is met at the station by the tribe. They ride to the camp, where the Chief joyfully greets his son, and commands his people to make merry to celebrate his homecoming. Hal Benton, an Easterner, rides on to ask his way to the hotel where he is stopping with some friends, among them his fiancee, Veda Mead, and her father. Knowing that the Indian ceremonies will interest his friends, Hal obtains permission to come the next day and bring them. The Chief calls Morning Star, an Indian maiden, telling his son that she is to be his squaw. Silver Water is pleased with her.,

The next day Hal Benton and his friends arrive. While the others inspect the camp, Veda Mead amuses herself with Silver Water, and ere long is thoroughly infatuated with him, while the Indian's vanity is touched by the attentions of the society coquette, and he promises to meet her the next day. Their little tête-à-tête is cut short by the entrance of Morning Star. The next day they meet and after coquetting with Silver Water until he forgets his Indian sweetheart, the Eastern girl gives him her calling card, upon which she writes "To my Indian Hero," and asks him to call upon her in the East.

Several months pass, and Hal Benton and Veda Mead are preparing to wed. when a letter arrives addressed to Mr. Mead from Silver Water, telling him that as he is in the East, he will do himself the honor to call upon them that evening. To Veda, who had been reading of the Indians' lives and customs after her meeting with Silver Water, the news is very terrifying. Recalling how she played with him, she fears that he may now make trouble. She goes to the veranda and sits down to think over the situation. Suddenly she sees Silver Water in full war-paint and feathers coming up the steps—he sees her and advances; touching her upon the shoulder, he beckons her to follow. Horrified, but unable to resist, she obeys. As they reach the garden he tells her of his love, reminds her of her promises when they last met, and insists upon her fulfilling them now. She cries out, and her cry brings Hal. Silver Water tells Hal why he has come for Veda, and Hal agrees that she must go with him; but Silver Water is not satisfied. He throws down his knife and insists upon Hal fighting with him for the girl. At a given signal, both men start for the knife. The Indian secures it, and soon kills Hal; then, throwing his blanket over the terrified Veda, he drags her off to his camp and commands her to fetch and carry and cook his meals. Veda sinks to the ground as Silver Water stalks off, but no sooner has he gone than Morning Star slips out from her tepee and, creeping down upon Veda, raises her knife to strike the girl dead. Just as the knife descends, Veda forces herself to rise, only to find herself in Hal's arms on the veranda, for the young man has been trying to awaken her to tell his sweetheart that their Indian friend, Silver Water, has arrived, and at that moment stands beside them in the most correct evening dress. At the first glance she gives him, Silver Water realizes that it would be impossible to ever win the white girl, so, leaving her with Hal, he tears up her card, and returns to the blanket and Morning Star, his sweetheart, before he has learned the white man's ways.

They arrive and are met by Paul's cowboy friends. In the meanwhile, the widow's daughter has flatly refused to marry Van Allen and the Colonel's daughter is just as determined to refuse to marry Paul. The two girls quarrel over the situation, and Helen, refusing to ride with the Western girl, goes off driving by herself, only to have the horse run away. Paul, on his way home from the station, sees the runaway, and dashes to the rescue, and the two young people are not at all displeased with each other until they arrive at the Brooks' home and Helen becomes aware of the identity of her rescuer.

The next day the colonel and the widow try to effect a reconciliation between the four young people, without avail. However, Van Allen has an idea which, after coaxing, the young people agree to follow. This is to try and marry the colonel and the widow, which will leave the young people free to do as they wish. The boys tell the colonel that the widow just adores him, while the girls confide to the widow that the colonel worships her. The widow is flattered. and greatly pleased. DOWN AND OUT
Majestic Release, April 21

Thomas Walton, old-time tragedian, and Leonard Williams, modern light comedian, are roommates in a theatrical boarding house. They are in arrears in their board to the extent of fifty-six dollars each, and are forced to vacate their congenial surroundings, and seek a cheap, attic room.

Leonard reads an advertisement for a valet, and, as they have to eat, goes forth to apply for the position. He is promptly engaged by a prosperous-looking gentleman named Thomas, and his first duty is to take out a suit of clothes belonging to that worthy, to have it pressed. After this errand he rushes to the attic to tell Walton of his good fortune.

He finds the tragedian in a predicament. A letter has followed him from the boarding-house, telling him to apply for an engagement, at a certain manager's office, and to come properly dressed for a society drama, in order to make a good impression. Walton's clothes hardly "look the part." A brilliant idea occurs to the newly engaged valet, and he rushes to the tailor, brings back his employer's clothes, and lends them to his friend.

Thus arrayed, the tragedian presents himself at the manager's office, and that person proves to be no other than Thomas, the employer of Leonard. Thomas is at once struck by the appearance of the suit. He finds his name in the lining of the coat, and detains the embarrassed actor, while he sends for his new valet.

When Leonard arrives nothing is possible but confession. The manager's heart is touched by the story, and he engages the tragedian. It is then suggested that the valet, too, is an actor, and, after some demur, Thomas gives Leonard a contract. The two friends gleefully desert their attic room, and return to the boarding-house. There, with their contracts as evidence of prosperity, they are restored to favor, and to their places at the more or less sumptuous boarding-house table.

THE INSTALLMENT PLAN
Majestic Release, April 23

Edwin Jones has social aspirations, but little money. When he receives word that a wealthy French count is going to present a letter of introduction to him, he conceives the idea of fitting up his drawing-room, on the installment plan, in order to make an impression. Incidentally, he thinks his daughter, Ethel, may make an impression on the nobleman.

All this meets with the disapproval of Frank Wesley, a young man favored by Ethel, but not by her parents. Frank has no great wealth or social position, but is blessed with an active brain. A month passes, the drawing-room is beautifully furnished, the count has reached our shores, and announced that he will call.

Frank repairs to the installment house, and meets Bill Mason, a rough and energetic furniture mover, who has been left in charge, and reminds him that the second installment on Jones' furniture has not been paid. Bill promptly goes and removes the fittings and furniture of the drawing-room, despite the protests of the family. When the count presents himself he is not admitted to the house. Edwin Jones and wife are having bitter thoughts, in their empty drawing-room, but Ethel is secretly pleased.

Jones now visits Bill, and, unable to pay the full installment, bribes him to return the furniture. Frank learns of this, goes to Bill, and gives him a larger bribe to take the furniture away again. Meanwhile, the count has been informed that the family was out, at the time of his first visit. He has come again, and is showing his devotion to Ethel, who has made the expected mpression. Bill and his assistant enter, and jerk the furniture away, to the astonishment of the count, and the dismay of the family.

Despair sharpens Jones' wits, and he decides to furnish the room himself. With the aid of tools he converts some boxes and barrels into the form of chairs and tables, and these, covered with draperies, make very good substitutes. Frank views this with chagrin, but when the family goes, he takes Jones' saw, cuts the chairs and table nearly in two, and puts them back in their former positions.

Jones informs the count that a horrid mistake has been made, and, despite the strange customs of this country, the nobleman calls again. He is impressed by the beauty of the new furniture, and more so by that of the daughter of the house. Jones and wife discreetly withdraw. The count turns devotedly to Ethel. He leans gracefully against a table which promptly collapses. He recovers himself with difficulty, and Ethel begs him to be seated. Down goes the chair, and when the flustered count throws himself into another, he makes a final crash to the floor amidst the ruined furniture.

This is too much, even for French politeness, and, rising to his feet, the count indulges in violent language and gestures, which could be understood by a native of any country. He then departs, angrily and finally. Frank enters at this embarrassing moment. He appeals to Jones, and says that if he gets Ethel, Jones will get the furniture, and the father decides that an American husband will, after all, be better for his daughter. The incident is closed by Bill and his assistants once more restoring the installment plan furniture to the drawing-room.

HER MOUNTAIN HOME
American Release, April 25

Ralph Kennington, dying of thirst in the alkali dust of the desert, staggered forward until exhaustion sprawled him flat on his face. Instinctively his hand clutched at the pebbles, when lo! to his astonished gaze a dull yellow glow announced the magic word, "Gold!"

An hour later James Raleigh found him there with the nugget tightly clasped in his hand. The long-desired bonanza had been finally discovered. The little mining town became the scene of the utmost activity. Scurrying miners, with new claims in their hands, the riff-raff women of the town, the prairie schooners loaded with belongings of the miners, playing children, frolicking dogs —all blended into a familiar picture in Western mining towns, announcing to the experienced eye the fact that a new gold field was discovered.

Ralph Kennington, recovered, had gone to live with his new-found pal, Jim Raleigh. The two became fast friends, and were the first to hurry back to the gold field.

Among those who joined that first mad rush was old man Hadley and his pretty daughter, Marguerite. Years of unsuccessful mining had greatly impoverished his fortunes and health—so, when, at last, he found his claim rich beyond his dreams, the poor old miner's heart gave away, leaving pretty Marguerite without a protector.

Ralph and James took her in, and for some months everything moved smoothly. Both men fell deeply in love with their young housekeeper. James made love to her in his hold way, pleading that she run away with him. But Ralph pursued different methods. Without saying a word to any one of his intentions, Ralph built on the mountainside a magnificent home, hiding his time until it should be finished, when he would ask her to be its mistress.

Jim made better headway. The two planned an elopement, and left suddenly one day, with only a litle note to explain their disappearance. Ralph found it. Hearthroken, he strolled aimlessly to town. In the meantime, the eloping couple stopped at a neighboring store before boarding the stage for their journey. Marguerite went inside while Jim waited. When she again emerged, her horror-stricken eyes saw Jim tightly clasping the form of a strange young woman, who evidently had just reached town from the East. Jim had no thought of Marguerite. With his former love, he sauntered carelessly down the street.

Then Ralph appeared, and, taking in the situation at a glance, put his arm about the tearful Marguerite, and led her to the new home on the mountainside.

THE PENSIONERS
American Release, April 29

Charles Bramwell, aged 65, was a retired army officer, bearing the rank of captain. Now in his old age he had nothing on which to live save his quarterly pension, and living was high in California.

But the captain has two sons: Dick, quick, clear-thinking, a popular young fellow with both men and women, and Will, slower witted, careless, lazy and indifferent.

One day a message came while the captain sat under the trees in his yard and playfully fondled his sword, reminiscent of bygone days. The message was short, and addressed from a legal firm in the East. It read: "As per the last will and testament of your late friend, Col. W. A. Reiggs, we are sending to your care his two daughters, in accordance with your understanding."

The daughters arrived. Clarice proved haughty, indifferent to others and quarrelsome. Madge, on the contrary, soon showed herself a kind and thoughtful girl, and in many ways the direct antithesis of her sister. Curiously enough, Dick found himself drawn strongly toward Clarice. They spooned together beneath the fine old trees, went on long jaunts and generally became so immersed with themselves that they entirely forgot the other members of the family.

But a change was coming over Will. He no longer neglected to carry water, bring the firewood, and do the chores about the house. There grew up a comradeship between him and Madge, brought about, no doubt, through the fact that all the household work was thrown upon their shoulders.

Then c day came when neither Clarice nor Dick could be found. Finally, the aged mother discovered a note which explained the mad infatuation, and brought the sorrowful news that the family could expect nothing more from Dick or Clarice. BROTHERS

Champion Release, April 24

Here is a story of life among the humble and lowly. It deals first with a woman who has lost her husband. Her two boys are now her mainstay and support. These boys are aged, respectively, six and eight. They sell papers, and give their earnings to their mother. The elder of the boys is inclined to be wild, and one day he is arrested for crap playing, and is sent to a reformatory. He escapes from the institution and returns to find his mother is dead and his brother gone, the younger brother having been taken in charge by a Catholic priest.

Thirty years now go by, and we witness several stirring scenes of contrast in the lives of the brothers. The elder is dissolute, and follows the career of a burglar; the younger has been raised by the good priest who closed his mother's eyes, and, following the trend of his bringing-up, has become himself a priest of God.

One day the burglar is hotly chased, and we see him dash into the church wherein his brother, the priest, officiates. The latter answers his appeal for protection and goes out, locking the door—shutting it against the minions of the law. Later, the wounded man discovers, through a large picture of the mother on the priest's wall, that his saviour is his own brother.

He is dying now, and, exhorted by the priest, asks forgiveness of God for his sins. The priest gives him absolution, and the repentant sinner passes to the throne of God. The mother appears in a vision, blessing her two sons. The one just departed for realms of bliss and the other, a holy minister, who still lives to fight for righteousness.

THE SEWER (Two Reels)

Solax Release, April 24

Herbert Moore is the leader of a gang of crooks. He leads by sheer force of mentality, while his pal, Burley Butts, leads by brutal force. Between them, they have a plan to rob Mr. Stanhope, a noted philanthropist, on whom Moore has been spying. For their ill purposes they use little Oliver, an unwilling pupil of Butts. On a dark night they embark on their venture.

Gripping events succeed each other in rapid succession. Oliver enters the house. He makes his way with a bull's-eye lantern—here we have a remarkable light effect—a sudden flash, the lights go up, and little Oliver faces the muzzle of a revolver. Mr. Stanhope is surprised to see the youthful criminal. He quizzes him. But little Oliver cries and tells his story. Stanhope is moved by the boy's tale. In taking out his handkerchief to dry his eyes, Oliver drops a silver half-dollar. Mr. Stanhope attempts to return it to Oliver, hut the child brushes it away, and tells him to keep it, informing Stanhope that the silver half-dollar is the insignia of the gang, and that it can open in the middle and be used in an emergency as a saw with which the user may cut rope, wire or glass. Stanhope's interest is aroused, and he places the little souvenir in his pocket. Later, this piece of metal is one of the means of saving his life. Oliver then pleads to be let free, and Stanhope allows him to go, after taking an oath that he will not attempt to steal again.

This attempt failing, the gang sets a trap for Stanhope, but little Oliver passes a note and key to his benefactor when the thugs lower him into a vault. When Stanhope finds himself in the narrow vault, he struggles hard to free himself from the bonds which almost cut to the bones. He frees himself sufficiently to get the silver half-dollar, which he now puts to good use. After hours of effort he breaks his bonds. He tries to straighten himself and then finds the heavy key and the note in his coat pocket.

He is scarcely able to read the instructions. The greenish light gives him the appearance of a man risen from the dead. Gradually his dulled mind absorbs the portent of the note. He desperately feels for the secret keyhole. His search is not in vain. Presently, he swings back the granite door, and he is confronted with a vista of the city's filth and slime. He crawls through the outlet, and makes his way through the sewer channels. The stench from stagnant sewerage pools, cesspool waste, mud and dirt, nearly suffocates him. But on and on he struggles, up to his knees through this liquid filth. Even an attack by a horde of sewer rats does not swerve him from his path. He fights the rodents off and they scamper. At last, weary and exhausted, he finds his way to the sewerage main,

REJUVENATION

Thanhouser Release, April 23

A rich man who finds that there is nothing in life worth living for, is worse off than is a poor man in similar circumstances, for the poor man may be stricken with ambition, and in a last effort to attain fame and fortune redeem himself.

But what is a man to do if he has wealth, health, all the fame he desires, and yet looks at life through blue spectacles?

A man of this stamp is yawning out an utterly purposeless existence. He is comparatively young. There are no business cares to vex him, he has money enough to ensure comfort, and yet he is thoroughly unhappy.

He visits a winter resort down South, not for the benefit of his health, or for enjoyment, for he realizes that he will be thoroughly bored. He has no chums there, his friends simply endure him, and he is as thoroughly unhappy as he had been in Europe or in the North.

Perhaps some kind fairy took pity upon him, and induced him to go out rowing all alone, for he lost his oars and drifted about aimlessly all night, believing that his last hour had come.

The good fairy so directed the boat that in the morning, when the rich man was unconscious from thirst, hunger and exhaustion, the tiny craft drifted near a lighthouse. The keeper's daughter saw the boat, swam out and guided it ashore, at considerable risk to herself, and with the aid of her father restored the rich man to consciousness.

His benefactors did not know that their unfortunate guest was a rich man. They regarded him as one of themselves, and the keeper regarding him with favor, finally offered him a job as his assistant, which he whimsically accepted.

He finds his new life so different from the old one that he positively enjoys living. He forgets his old troubles, and within a short time decides that there is nothing that could induce him to go back to his former aimless, empty existence. The keeper's daughter wins his love, and makes him happy by agreeing to marry him, and he finds that each day is happier than the one that preceded it.

Years later, his old friend, who has mourned him as dead, happens to visit a lighthouse, accompanied by his wife, and is surprised to recognize in the assistant keeper the former clubman, long regarded as dead, and, in fact, so declared by the courts. The friend urges him to return, telling him that his heirs can be compelled to return his fortune, but he refuses.

"I have my fortune here," he says, "my wife and child. My only fear is that they may be forced back into the life I once led. I have a lovely wife, a beautiful child, enough to live upon, and my days are happy. The other life, well I know what it is, and have no desire to try it again. Let my heirs keep the money. It is valueless to me."

The friend, being a true friend, kept the secret. Yet he never could understand the once rich man's reasoning, for he was not a philosopher, and, furthermofe, had not been rich long enough to realize that money is not everything in this world.

WHEN MANDY CAME TO TOWN

Thanhouser Release, April 26

In appearance he was a "rube," but he was comfortably well off and steadily growing richer. He ran the "opery house," had plenty of real estate, money in the bank, and a loving wife and a little girl of whom he had reason to be proud.

Then came the temptation of this rural St. Anthony, a one-night stand actress, pretty in a bold way, who made goo-goo eyes at him.

It must be admitted that there was some excuse for the girl. Her company had had the hardest kind of sledding, and when they reached this little community, the indications were that they would be compelled to remain and grow up there. They had no money, their baggage was due to be held, and the walking was rough. So the girl told her troubles to the rural magnate, and displayed great histrionic abilities in doing so. The rich man wept, then gave freely of his wealth, and the company moved on to the next stand.

One peculiarity of certain theatrical companies is that they are always in trouble. The girl was ready to act the next season; she had an engagement and a lovely rôle, the only difficulty was that it was a financial impossibility to take the troupe across the East River, unless an angel was found. So her thoughts naturally turned to the "Rube" who had shown that he would listen to the appeals of beauty in distress.

She invited him into the city to talk over a "wonderful opportunity." Gladly he accepted, telling his trusty wife that "important business" was to blame; but he lost the woman's note, his child picked it up, and although Mandy was very small, she was able to realize that something was wrong, and decided to do what she could to put matters right.

By the time that Mandy arived at the New York hotel, the dinner given in honor of "the rube" was at its height. The festivities were too much for the rural visitor, and he had dropped off asleep. He was awakened by hearing sarcastic laughter. Drowsily he opened his eyes, blinkingly he looked around. The mirth was caused by his little daughter, and these "show folks," who had seemed to him to be excellent comrades, were brutally jeering at her.

It came to him with a shock of surprise that neither he nor his daughter were properly placed, and he realized that the only reason he had been tolerated was because of his money. Grieved and indignant, he gathered his child in his arms and left "Bohemian life" forever.

In the morning when the country wife came downstairs at dawn, she was glad to greet her husband, who, she believed, had arrived on the early morning train. She was puzzled, however, at the warmth of his embrace, and also because he had led her into the baby's room and stood glancing at their sleeping child with new love in his eyes.

For the wife did not know that Mandy went to town. She never knew it, for her husband and the child always carefully guarded the secret.

THE CRIMSON HEART
Lux Release, April 26

Jean Legrand and his companions carry on a very successful campaign in some of the most fashionable Parisian hotels. Their occupation is thieving, and they adopt the most up-to-date methods of their kind. The arrival at the Hotel Rougemont of the famous singer, Miss Marie Barlowe, is noted by these gentry, and they are soon installed in an adjoining room. At the dead of night a dark figure is to be seen moving stealthily in the upper corridors of the Hotel Rougemont. It attempts to enter a room, a woman's cry comes through the night followed by a revolver shot. Then all is silent; but not for long. The whole place is in an uproar, as the servants and guests of the hotel rush up to the spot whence the scream came. Miss Barlowe is found to have fainted in her room. She tells the story of the hand which was pushed through the opening door of her room. She remembers no more. Some time later, Miss Barlowe is attacked by a cowardly ruffian, but the assault is baffled by the opportune and highly romantic appearance of a handsome stranger who rescues the young lady. A friendship springs up between the young couple, and Miss Barlowe finally accepts the stranger's invitation to dine with him. They proceed to dine at the hotel, and the meal progresses merrily, but suddenly Miss Barlowe utters a cry and staggers to the window. She has seen something upon the stranger's hand which awakens memories of her first and alarming night at the hotel. She is terribly excited, but conceals this under a pretended indisposition. She then retires and summons aid. Returning to her captive, she entertains him until the police arrive and he is arrested. Miss Barlowe is thus saved from the deep traps of Jean Legrand, for he is betrayed by the brand upon his hand—the Crimson Heart.

SUNDAY TUESDAY

The Majestic

IS KING OF COMEDY!

Thousands of exhibitors throughout the country are writing us that they like Majestic comedies better than any other pictures now being produced. This is the pulse of the entire country and the exchange not buying Majestic pictures today is losing its best opportunity to secure new customers and keep the old ones.

Do Not Miss These Comedies!

Sunday, April 21st, "Down and Out."—The Moving Picture World says: "It is a picture of actor life in a great city, funny to look at but tragic to the characters, the details are worked out with much thought and the whole plot is decidedly logical. If any comedy can be called a feature then this comedy is a feature."

Tuesday, April 23rd, "The Installment Plan." A roaring comedy—a young couple furnishes a house on the installment plan and fails to meet a payment; all furniture is removed and they make furniture of their own; a wealthy friend comes, pays them a visit, and the predicaments arising from home-made furniture will cause laughs from start to finish.

Sunday, April 28th, "Boys."—An excellent comedy. Mrs. Brown, a widow, has a son, John. Dr. Andrews, a widower, also has a son, John. The old folks marry and the boys do not agree—see what they do to each other and the old folks.

Tuesday, April 30th, "The Silent Call."—One of the strongest dramatic pictures ever produced—the silent call of the telephone switchboard in a gorgeous hotel plays the most important part and averts worlds of trouble.

Majestics at 9 Cents a Foot!

Exchange men, do not fail to send in your order at once—get the best pictures in the market at 9 cents a foot. By placing a standing order for two Majestics each week, you pay only 9 cents—the price for one a week is 10 cents—excellent four-color posters, 5 cents each.

APRIL 9th, "A WARRIOR BOLD"—FARCE COMEDY
APRIL 14th, "THE RETURN OF LIFE"—COMEDY, DRAMA
APRIL 16th, "NOT ON THE PROGRAMME"—COMEDY DRAMA

No wideawake exhibitor will be satisfied unless he gets TWO MAJESTICS EACH WEEK. If your Exchange will not give them to you, let us know.

HOW AMBITIOUS WAITER BECAME OWNER OF MOTION PICTURE SHOW

By John Trainor

Eight years ago a young German boy, John Wachter, walked into a large city restaurant and asked for a job as waiter. His broken English showed that his knowledge of the language was limited to a few words he had picked up in the steerage coming over, and the few weeks spent enjoying the excitement of New York. The letters in his pocket showed that he had been a good, trained writer at home, had held responsible positions, but had not acquired a knowledge of English.

He carried in his hand a small bundle, tied in a handkerchief. This contained his worldly possessions, except for the $50 needed to admit him into New York City, and which he had already deposited in the bank.

The head waiter, an Englishman, who had worked his way up from small beginnings in this country, saw in the boy's sturdy countenance a determination to succeed. If he did not get a place in this restaurant, he would make the rounds until he found a job somewhere. So, after a few minutes' conversation, the head waiter gave him a job as bus boy, explaining that as soon as he had learned the language, perhaps he would get something better.

Won Promotion in a Year

The energetic German said little and hustled much. Either he was found busy carrying out trays or studying a German-English dictionary. At the end of six months he had learned enough English to be given a station at a group of the less important tables. In a year's time he was ready for another promotion, with a good salary and large tips in view.

"I am sorry that I can't accept the offer," he said, "but I'm going into business for myself."

The statement struck the head waiter as amusing, so he inquired the nature of the new enterprise.

"Why, it's the moving picture business," the German answered.

"How did you come to think of that business?" asked the head waiter.

"Because," replied the youth, "when I was in New York the only theatre I could understand was the moving picture show. Some were good and others were not worth anything. I saw the good ones were of great educational worth to the people and meant good profits to the proprietors. Finally I got so interested in the business that I talked with every man in town.

In Business for Himself

"One day I waited on a generous customer and he was so interested in my enthusiasm for the business he has offered to back me up, saying that he did not know whether he would get his money back, but he was willing to take a chance. I have plenty of confidence in the business and in myself, and I am going to pay him back with interest and run a high class show, too."

The head waiter was dissappointed at the prospect of losing one of his best men, but he was sure such a fellow would make good anywhere. He never heard anything more about him until a few weeks ago when he went with his family to the best moving picture show in the city. It was Wachter's.

To-day Wachter owns one of the flourishing moving picture shows in Baltimore and besides paying his backer in full with interest, he is making a good enough income to afford an auto and to own his own home.—Washington, D. C., Post.

EDUCATIONAL FILMS

WE do not want to take due credit from anyone who is justly entitled to the same. Regarding the attitude of educational films, as published time and again in these editorial columns of the Moving Picture News, as we have repeatedly stated, we commenced our education in 1889, and have watched the industry grow, but when others, jealous of our advancement and popularity, try to belittle us we feel that it is time to speak a word in our own favor and leave our readers to be the judge of our work.

There came into this office early this week a gentleman who stated he had made educational films and could not find any demand for them, that they were tabooed and that all the people wanted were spice and fights, elopements and such like ilk. The statement has been made that this is just an age of feature films that have only just been discovered. If our memory is correct, Charles Urban got out some wonderfully good feature films in 1898; that Williamson, of Hove, also made some special features, and two or three others whose names escape us at the present writing in England. Then in America Rich. G. Hollaman produced the feature film, "The Passion Play," some fifteen or sixteen years ago, and which at the time created quite an excitement. The only real picture ever taken of the real Passion Play was taken by William T. Stead at the special request of the late Queen Victoria, and only two copies of that are in existence—one in the possession of Andrew Lang, of Oberammergau, and the other in the vaults at Balmoral Castle—so that while the feature films are a rediscovered quantity, all honor is due to the men whose names are mentioned above. It has been our aim and desire to lift the art of cinematography upon the highest pedestal that as an art it is possible to do, and lift it out of the slough of nastiness and subjects that some manufacturers seem to delight to turn out. We quote from an editorial written by us in the Optical Lantern Journal, and written in August of that year, as follows. (We might say, in passing, that we had just taken over the editorship of the journal) :

> "Before taking the position it was whispered to us that the lantern had played its part, and that there was no longer any need for a paper to represent the interests of lanternists. Also that the cinematograph had ousted the lantern from its usual place and had set itself thereon.
> "To these objections we answered, and still repeat, that it is altogether a mistake to think that there is no further need for the lantern. There is hardly a church or chapel to-day—if fully up to date—that refuses the aid of the optical lantern for educational purposes, to raise funds, or to bring to the eye of the audience the work done by missionary efforts. They know the power that the actual scenes have to bring money to the work. In many instances their first-day Services, Hymns, Scriptures, Prayer, Sermon—all are illustrated with slides throughout.
> "We confess some of these are poor and mediocre; the drawing out of plans and the coloring is not what it should be; but still it shows the influences for good the lantern yields. The P. L. S., or "Popular Lantern Services," are being formed in every large center, and it is impossible to estimate the good influence they are having on the lives of those attending them.
> "The universities, colleges, public schools, even the Board schools, are using the lantern as a means of education. Almost every lecturer of note, spreading science throughout the country, educating the people through the sources of the 'Gilchrist,' Birmingham, Cambridge and Oxford University Extension Lectures, uses the optical lantern for his illustrations. Agitators, food reformers, temperance workers, land reformers, political parties, Education League, Church Extension and Church Disestablishment, all follow suit. We have hardly realized yet the full power of the optical lantern, to say nothing about the science lanterns and the microscopic projection apparatus. The cinematograph will never take the place of these. Although we believe there is a good future before it, at present it is chiefly used in the music halls and variety theatres acting the part of an illustrated newspaper, bringing pictures of passing events vividly before us which last a short time and are then useless. In the near future none of our great educational centers will be completely equipped without one in every lecture theatre. The medical students will be able to see on the screen actual representations of wonderful surgical operations of such a nature as are being carried out by Dr. Douin, of Paris. Many thoughts and many ideas crowd upon our imagination as to the possibilities before the optical lantern and cinematograph."

We want to call special attention to those lines italicized, and for our readers to remember that this was ten years ago, and we believe the time is rapidly coming to the front when the latter part of our prophecy will be more than fulfilled. We want all our readers to help along these lines of progress and give the cinematographic art its proper place.

AT THE TOLL OF DEATH— THE WORLD MOURNS

The appalling disaster of the loss of the Titanic is one that appeals to the sympathies of every man, woman and child throughout the world. In its stupendousness it eclipses any maritime disaster on record, and we feel we would not be doing our duty if we did not make some mention of this terrible calamity. A sacrifice to speed! We are sufficiently interested in this matter, owing to the fact that motion pictures were taken of its launching and its sailing, and many cameras were ready to greet the boat when she came up New York Bay, but, alas! man proposes and Allah disposes.

It is with great regret to us that several of our friends have gone down in the ill-fated vessel. Notably and first in our mind occurs the name of William T. Stead, the founder and editor of the Review of Reviews. It was only on Monday morning, just as we were preparing to leave town, that we dictated a letter to Mr. William E. Shaw, American editor of the Review of Reviews, asking him to arrange an interview with our friend, William T. Stead for auld lang syne. To those who have known and worked with Mr. Stead the news came with a great shock. It was our province and pleasure to work with him in his psychical research studies, and many are the happy hours that we have spent in the seance room when the letters from Julia and others were dictated. We better knew him, though, as the founder of the National Lantern Society in England, where he gave a helping hand to every aspiring lanternist throughout the country, and we were elected one of the officers of that society, and as long as he published the little paper on behalf of the Nationalists of England we were regularly in touch with him both by voice and pen.

Another good friend for whom there may yet be hope is the Rev. Dr. J. Stuart Holden, of Glasgow, who was on his way here to address, with William T. Stead, the great Men and Religion Movement which has already started men thinking, and we believe that a wonderfully good harvest will result from its work. We were in hopes of meeting once more J. S. Holden, with whom we have stood on several platforms addressing the multitudes of England and Scotland. It is hard that such men, who are a pride and a credit to the whole world, should be thus suddenly swept away in the vortex of the illimitable sea. We trust, with other papers, that by raising our voice in protest that some arrangements more equitable for the safety of the passengers will be arranged for, and that the Northern passage will be tabooed in future during the winter months by every vessel passing between the ports of England and New York. What is speed, what is a day, what is an hour, compared to eternity and the great sacrifice of human life for the sake of crowding a few extra minutes in arriving at the dock?

DIRECTORS, ACTORS AND ACTRESSES

Why—again we ask, why—do some manufacturers get the most illiterate, uncouth, ill-mannered directors they can possibly find to stage their pictures? In visiting some of the studios it has been a surprise to us to hear the vile language emanating from some of the directors and also to see the directors acting so ungentlemanly and so ungallant as to blow tobacco smoke into the faces of ladies. If we were manufacturing pictures and we wanted to get a scene wherein ladies and gentlemen are supposed to act the parts, we would get well-educated, well-bred directors who know of subjects and how to act the part due to a gentleman of breeding. The same applies to the actors and actresses. Why is it that so many amateurs of the men kind, as far as the motion picture film is concerned, receive employment they have no knowledge of expressing in pantomimic action what the film should portray ? This was painfully illustrated to us a short while ago where a tragedy was converted into a comedy and still the film went out. If it is necessary to portray the part of a gentleman, a gentleman should act the part, not fat, woggety, uncouth people who don't know how to use their hands or where to put them. This applies in a still larger degree to many actresses we have met. Why is it that every moving picture actress must have blondine hair, or does she go to the trouble of making black hair blondine when her whole make-up is utterly at variance with her headgear? And why should the beautiful red golden hair of the Titian type be dyed or peroxided? Is it for effect, or what is it? If it is for effect, we certainly think that it is lost. Oh, ye denizens of the footlights, ye directors, ye managers! It may be necessary to paint and bedaub the lips with carmine and the eyebrows and eyelashes charcoaled, but when it comes on the picture what is the result. A great mass of black—coal-black—lips, chalk-pasty face and black eyebrows.

Another point we want specially to enforce: Why is it necessary for some actors and actresses, of whom, we understand, there are some five hundred-odd seeking employment in the various studios, to pay an agent so large a fee as some of them claim. We heard the story of an agent the other day, and we just hesitate about printing it, who robbed, stole from actresses what was justly their due. It is only $5 a picture that the girls and men get from the manufacturer, but when this agent gives them a paltry $1.50 and keeps $3.50 for himself—oh, ye gods! where is the justice of this? When we heard some of the stories of woe of these actors and actresses we had to tell them we felt we would open an employment bureau and registration office, but are afraid to take it up owing to the vast amount of detail work it will require; but surely, oh, ye agents, 5 per cent. is enough out of such a poor stipend of $5, which may have to last the girls three and four weeks before they get another engagement. Many would-be actresses come to us, many actresses of the legitimate stage come and ask us to give them recommendations. All we can do is to give them the name and address of the various studios and send them along, but we say to them all, if you can earn $2 a day outside the moving picture business it will keep you in luxury owing to the irregular employment obtained in the moving picture studio. Are we right, Messrs. Manufacturers, Managers, Directors?

TO OUR ADVERTISERS AND READERS

Many comments on the nature of the film come to us in letters from our readers. Some of these letters are very caustic in their expression of what a certain film or films are. It recently occurred to us that to stimulate interest in the pictures we will design medals which we will offer our advertisers and friends as to the result of a vote. We propose making out a ballot paper on which the trade mark with name and address of every manufacturer shall appear, and distribute some ten to fifteen thousand of these throughout the whole world of cinematography, and on the result of the ballot as to the best manufacturer by majority of votes we will award a gold medal, for the second one a silver medal, and to the third in the running a bronze medal, and call it "The Moving Picture Medal of Merit." Of course it would be very invidious if we restricted any manufacturer in the country from this contest. We therefore propose to issue one to the Licensed manufacturers and the other to the Independent manufacturers. The names of the judges and conditions will be given in an early issue providing our readers feel interested enough to take up this matter.

MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF PENNSYLVANIA

233 Fifth Avenue

Pittsburgh, Pa., April 16, 1912.

To the Motion Picture Exhibitors of Pennsylvania and Adjoining States:

Don't forget that the Exhibitors' State Convention of Pennsylvania exhibitors will be held in Pittsburgh on Monday and Tuesday, June 24th and 25th, 1912. And every exhibitor who attends is assured a big time, as our committees are making arrangements to show you all a good time in Pittsburgh.

We are arranging for a boat excursion down the Ohio river, also a sightseeing tour of our city on special cars, taking in all the points of interest, historical and otherwise, and our committee has arranged with three of the finest hotels in Pittsburgh to take care of the visitors, at rates that will be satisfactory to all, and many of the progressive business men of the Industrial City have promised to aid us in showing you all a good time.

We also wish to call attention to the fact that many of the leading interests in the motion picture business are going to arrange for display space, and those wishing to take advantage of the advertising space in our program will kindly write or call at the headquarters, as space is selling rapidly.

And as there are many things of vital importance to come before the convention, it is to the best interests of all the exhibitors to attend. Now let us hear from you.

We remain yours for organization,

MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF PENNSYLVANIA.

CENTURY FILM COMPANY

One after another new film companies come to light, and many of them under excellent organization. Such is the case with the Century Film Company, whose headquarters are at 320 Fuller building, Springfield, Mass., and of which Joseph Spero is general manager.

Joseph Spero was formerly with the W. E. Greene Exchange, Boston, and later New England representative of the World's Best Film Company. Mr. Spero has been the organizer of the Century Film Company, which proposes to handle some of the finest feature films on the market, selling state rights for same.

The first feature film to be handled by this company is "The Land of Darkness" of Eclair. This is a very splendid two-reel production, and may be considered a fair example of what is to follow.

Among the cast of players who were engaged by the Paris Eclair Company for this production are the following: Cecile Guyon, of the Renaissance Theatre, Paris; V. Vibert and M. Liabel, of the Post St. Martin Theatre, Paris; and Charles Krause, of the Sarah Bernhardt Theatre, Paris. Needless to say, superb work has been done in the production by these tried artists. Also startling photographic effects have been obtained.

The scene of "The Land of Darkness" is laid in the vicinity of a mine. Claire Lenoir, who is left an orphan, is committed to the care of a widowed aunt, whose son, Louis, a workman at the mines, falls in love with Claire. A rival arises in the shape of Louis' chum, Charles, who asks Claire to marry him. Claire, suspecting that her cousin is in love with her, refuses Charles. The result of the whole affair is that after Louis actually becomes engaged to Claire the two rivals have a fight down in the bottom of the mine. In the struggle one of the miners' lamps is broken, causing a terrible explosion, in which Charles is injured.

Louis, seeing his friend suffering from his injuries, melts and, forgetting their differences, carries him to a place of safety.

The story contains the most tense situations. An underground lake bursts its bounds and the passageways are flooded with water. A most exciting scene occurs when the friends of the submerged miners frantically await at the mouth of the mine news of their loved ones. They can hear efforts being made to reach them, but are unable to be of any service themselves. Louis continues to answer the tappings which announce the approach of the rescuers, but, unable to resist the poisonous vapors of the mine, he falls dying across the body of his friend just as the rescue party have succeeded in breaking through the wall of rock.

This picture should prove a fine seller. If it's sensation you are after, you can surely find it in "The Land of Darkness."

MOVING STYLE

Fashion never stands still. It is always moving. So a moving picture of the spring styles in feminine apparel, which embraces every item the ladies of the Four Hundred and a few dozens more will wear in 1912, is appropriate and should have the reward of feminine recognition and masculine interest universally.

The Rex Motion Picture Company have made a "Fashion Review" to be released Thursday, April 25th, that is at once unique, interesting and instructive. Every item of apparel, from hats to shoes, that the wives and daughters of money will wear this prosperous year are reviewed in interesting and spellbinding "fashion." The gowns that will be worn at afternoon teas in Millionaire Row and at the opera and evening receptions of people whose names we read in the newspapers, furnished for the occasion by Bonwit, Teller & Co., of the Avenue, make an unusual number of feet. And talking about feet, the shoes that shelter the feet of these same women were contributed by society's pet bootmakers, J. & J. Slater. Stockings marvelous in texture and delicate design, from Peck & Peck; coiffures by Senegas, and costumes and millinery by Bonwit, Teller & Co., go to complete a Fashion Review that is detailed and thorough.

The release should interest the Queen of the Kitchen and Milady of the Boudoir, the man who talks with condescension of a million or so, and the officer on the beat.

And it is a beat.

A CORRECTION

In our issue of April 13th we reproduced an article on the Moving Picture Movement, taken from the "Independent," and from which, by inadvertence, a slug was omitted giving credit to our contemporary. This was not intentional on our part, and we take this opportunity to make reparation.

A QUESTION OF HAIR

(Solax)

A Shoemaker.....Lee Beggs
His Daughter.....Marian Swayne
His Apprentice.....Billy Quirk
The Other Woman.....Fannie Simpson

"A rag and bone and a hank of hair," has led many a man to forget to care for the one so fair, he had left in the "air." Men often forget about loved ones, and keep chasing a phantom beauty. Upon closer observation and experience, ripened by time, they find their mistake, "even as you and I."

This is really the sad experience of a shoemaker's apprentice in this Solax production. If Billy had not discovered his mistake in time it might have ended in a tragedy; as it is, Billy is rescued in time, and appreciates the comedy of his situation.

Billy's mania for hair gets him into trouble. He meets a girl with luxuriant hair at a dance, and forgets about his little sweetheart. When all is black for the pretty little shoemaker's daughter, Billy sees a light in the way of false hearts and false hair. And aside he cast "the woman who didn't care."

"THE POST TELEGRAPHER"—"101" BISON HEADLINER

Replete with sensationalism, showing scene upon scene of battle and heroic deeds, carrying a beautiful story of a girl's love for a soldier, and remarkable for its extraordinary dramatic rendition, "The Post Telegrapher," the Bison two-reel headliner which is ready for shipment May 1, is without question one of the best productions of this world-famous series,—as good as "The Deserter." and considered by many as superior to that production.

Interesting scenes are shown of the parade grounds and of Bob Evans, one of the post telegraphers, at work. The following message comes over the wire:

"Sioux Indians holding war dance. Fear outbreak. Protect wagon trains and settlements. White, Indian commissioner."

A scouting party is immediately sent out, Evans being detailed therewith. The Indians, however, have already started on a mission of death and destruction. Settlers are wiped out and their cabins burned. They meet a Tartar in old man Hart, who barricades the doors and sells the lives of himself and his family at great cost to the redskins.

The approach of the soldiers is reported by means of smoke signals by Indians hidden on hilltops, and the savages lay a clever ambush into which the soldiers fall.

At the first volley Evans is tumbled from his saddle. The soldiers wheel around and dash back, but they are surrounded by "the circle of death," which narrows down like the coil of a python, until the few survivors, making the last desperate stand, are dispatched.

Meantime, Evans has regained consciousness. He makes for the telegraph line, and, stumbling and falling, reaches his goal. Racked with pain, and weak from loss of blood, he manages to reach the top of the pole, and taps the wire, connecting his pocket instrument. His sweetheart, Eva Reynolds, the daughter of an officer, is talking to the fort operator when this message ticks in:

"Ambushed in Rocky Gulch. Many killed. Cannot hold out much longer. Rush help. Evans."

Sharply the colonel gives his commands. The bugler calls "Boots and saddles," and in a few moments the troopers are rushing at breakneck speed to the aid of their comrades.

Anguished for the safety of her lover, Eva cannot bear the suspense, and, donning a soldier's uniform, she mounts a horse and follows the troop. When they reach the battleground they find the ground strewn with dead horses and men, mute evidence of the terrific struggle which took place. Without stopping to bury the dead, the soldiers follow the trail of the Indians, bent on vengeance.

Eva dismounts and looks for Bob. Not finding him, she remounts and circles around. Lying senseless at the telegraph post, she discovers Bob, and, reviving him, she lifts him to her horse's back, and mounting behind him gallops back to the fort.

The Indians have reached their camp, and the sentinels report the coming of the troops. A council of war is held, and a bold, strategic plan decided upon. Headdresses and blankets are mounted on sticks, which are thrust into the ground about the tepees. Making a detour, the Indians gallop madly toward the stockade, where the emigrants and settlers have taken refuge, under the protection of the small garrison left there.

The soldiers fall into the trap. With a telescope the colonel sees the dummies and, believing them to be Indians holding a council, advances upon the camp. The chagrin of the soldiers increases their anger, as they realize they have been tricked, after making a fruitless charge into the deserted camp, and, suspecting the plan of the Indians, they start back on the long ride to the fort.

Knowing that the time to accomplish their purpose is limited, the Indians hurl themselves at the stockade with indescribable fury. Inside, every hand that can hold a gun is sending leaden messengers of death into the Indian ranks. Getting up from the hospital cot, Bob joins the defenders, and, forgetful of his painful wounds, plunges into the fray. Soon the Indians begin jumping over the top of the stockade, and terrific hand to hand combats take place. Bob grapples with a huge buck, but in his weakened state is overpowered, and as the Indian, throttling him with his left hand, raises his right with a deadly tomahawk in it, Eva leaps upon him and plunges a knife into his heart.

As the tired horses thunder along, the troopers hear the shots and savage yells, and, conjecturing what is occurring at the stockade, their mounts are not spared, but plunging the spurs into their flanks, the soldiers swoop down on the Indians. With rage and resentment in their hearts they fight like demons, and the flashing sabers soon mark the end of the contest.

The end of the film shows a sunset scene, with the lowering of the flag, with Bob and Eva thanking Providence for their deliverance.

PARADISE AND PURGATORY

(Superior Feature Film Company)

That the filming of old classics and literary and dramatic masterpieces, both ancient and modern, is becoming general is a condition which reflects more than anything else could the signs of the times. The "Odyssey" and "Œdipus Rex" of Homer and Sophocles, "The Tempest" of Shakespeare and the great works of Dickens, Sardou, Dumas and others have already become household words in filmdom. Dante's "Inferno" has startled the world in its vividness of portrayal on the screen. And now comes to us in the extremity of beauty and horror the finale of the series in the "Paradise" and "Purgatory" being released by the same firm that handled the "Inferno," the Superior Feature Film Co., 32 Union Square, New York City.

These films come to us in four reels, 4,110 feet of film in all. They are of Psyche make, and some of the tinting photography and spectacular effects obtained in these films cannot, it seems, be surpassed. From the moment the inspiration seizes Dante, and he commences his weird journey with Virgil through the tortures of Purgatory, and onward through the beauty and peace of Paradise with Beatrice, to whose memory Dante was ever devoted, there is an intense interest in each situation.

On the way through Purgatory he meets with many whom he had known during their sojourn on earth. The portrayal of the different penalties apportioned the various offenders for as various offences is splendidly done. The proud carry huge rocks through wearisome mires; the envious sit from day to day with their eyes sewed up with threads of iron; the slothful are obliged to run eternally; the gluttons hunger and thirst, and so we are taken, step by step, through the wonderful mazes of the imaginings of the genius Dante.

In Paradise the more or less harrowed feelings of the spectator are alleviated and soothed by the wonderful beauty of the scenes. The cloud effects are very fine and it is in all a most commendable production. Slight imperfections in a production so gigantic in its aspirations are to be tolerated, and it is a master mind indeed who thinks out the possibilities of staging such a production.

Excellent photographs (14 in a set) will be provided along with this production for lobby display, as well as other advertising matter.

Mr. E. H. Rosenberg, of the Superior Feature Film Co., starts Tuesday evening on a tour through the New England states in the interests of the Paradise-Purgatory films.

TITANIC'S CAPTAIN IN KINEMACOLOR

Launching of the Ill-fated Ocean Liner, and Her Gallant Commander, To Be Shown in Color-Motion-Pictures at the Garden Theatre

What is probably the last and best photograph ever taken of Captain E. J. Smith, the gallant commander of the ill-fated ocean leviathan, the steamship Titanic, was one posed by the veteran commodore of the White Star fleet especially for the Kinemacolor camera, just before his last voyage from America, and at a time he had decided to abandon the sea forever, content to close his career of forty-three years of honorable and efficient service (which never had been marred by an accident on the high seas) while still in command of the steamship Olympic.

This most lifelike Kinemacolor portrait in color-motion-photography shows the hale and hearty septuagenarian surrounded by his chief officers, a remarkable specimen of vigorous old age crowned with honors. The compact figure and broad shoulders, even the good-humored twinkle in the alert gray eyes, so familiar to thousands of ocean voyagers, are reproduced with perfect fidelity. This interesting group will be shown for the first time this evening (Wednesday, April 17th) at the Garden Theatre, as an added feature to the Kinemacolor exhibition of "The Durbar" and the "Burial of the Maine," in conjunction with a reproduction by the same process of the launching of both the steamship Olympic and her sister ship, the unfortunate Titanic, the latter on May 31, 1911, from the famous Harland & Wolff yards at Queen's Island, Belfast.

James Clarence Harvey, poet, playwright, clubman and wit, and author of "The Great Name" and other plays, recently viewed an exhibition of "The Durbar in Kinemacolor," then in the sixth week of its Lenten popularity at the New York Theatre, New York City. An hour after the performance Mr. Harvey presented Mr. Henry J. Brock, president of the Kinemacolor Company of America, with the following verses, which he had dedicated to Mr. Charles Urban, the inventor of this famous process:

The Durbar

Being the author's expressed appreciation after viewing the marvelous reproduction of the actual scenes in Kinemacolor pictures, now on view at the Garden Theatre, New York City.

A riot of splendor and color!
The smoke and dust of the guns!
The brilliant red of troopers
And the setting of golden suns,
The stride of a thousand camels
And elephants, decked with gems!
A King and a Queen, on a pearl white throne,
In their royal diadems!

The shimmer and sheen of satin,
And the sombre khaki gray!
The cavalry charge of the Lancers
And a million souls, at play!
The Gray-beards, spared from the battle!
The princes of groud descent,
And fifty thousand British troops,
In the sun-kissed Orient!

And that's the tale of the Durbar,
Too big for the rhymester's rhyme,
For it paints a wondrous picture,
As true as the hand of Time.
'Tis a thousand great Meissonniers,
With a canvas wide as the world,
And the rainbow high is torn from the sky
And into the picture hurled.

The troops are living and breathing,
The horses go galloping past.
The trees and the flowers are growing,
In a dream, made true at last.
Then a wreath of bay for Urban,
Who gathered from Nature's store,
The power to portray the things of to-day,
For the future, forevermore.

JAMES CLARENCE HARVEY.

The progress which the educational department of the Kinemacolor has made is exceeding all expectations. Letters from prominent educators keep constantly arriving and all express their hearty approval and commendation of Kinemacolor as a powerful instrument in education. Professor Brander Matthews, of Columbia University, the country's most eminent authority on the history of the drama, has displayed such keen interest in this department of the Kinemacolor company that he has offered many valuable suggestions and has promised to lend his assistance. President Schurman, of Cornell University, has also offered to lend his hearty co-operation in any field which the Kinemacolor may choose to enter. Prof. J. Ellsworth Call, the distinguished botanist and biologist and author of many scientific books, is expressing his hearty approval by lending his valuable assistance in the preparation of botanical and biological subjects which will be photographed in Kinemacolor.

Israel Zangwill, philosopher, novelist, dramatist and publicist, has this to say of the educational value of motion pictures in general and Kinemacolor in particular: "It seems to me that the bioscope should certainly be used in every school in the country. I think there is little doubt that it will eventually revolutionize the teaching on such subjects as history, geography and natural science. The child will be fed with experience in place of words; it will be given realism in place of abstraction, and, in brief, lessons will be changed from torture to a treat. Cinematograph will pluck out knowledge from the dead matter of the text-book and set it flaming alive before the pupil's eyes."

AN ITALIAN ROMANCE

(Champion)

The cut herewith depicts a realistic scene from this charming story, that vigorously throbs and pulsates with the overmastering passions of hate and love. This beautiful picture play, dealing with the love of a woman and the perfidy of a man, really possesses the germ of greatness. In it we see the battling of the passions, and this is so wrought out as to make a conflict worthy of the highest form of dramatic presentation.

The laying of the scenes so as to inject into the story the atmospheric condition required is well thought out, the basement cellar and the café being especially worthy of mention. The groupings of the various types are most artistically accomplished. The duel and its happy termination is a splendidly elaborated climax. Those who have already seen it at the Champ studio vote it a good business-getter for the trade-mark that heads this reel of film. Released May 1st.

SNAP-SHOTS BY A MIND-CAMERA

Mary Lawton Metcalfe

"Yaas, ma Honey, seein' is believin'—sho nuf," said Mammy when she saw the "L" trains whizzing overhead, as we arrived from our Southern home.

"I bin hear 'bouten de cayrs up in de sky, but nobody kin mek me b'lieve a whopper till m' own eye prove de gospel truth—now I kin b'lieve, kase I see."

There's your cue, ladies and gentlemen of the moving picture trade—it is up to each and every one of us to "mek de onbelievers see" that there is the actual power of illustrated talking that will be valuable in every department of the world's progress.

* * * *

Strange, but true, the leaders most to be helped are the most antagonistic to moving pictures. I speak pointedly of the ministers, who are pledged to distribute the comfort of religion to those who look to the churches and pastors for spiritual uplift.

In every other New York paper one sees advance notices of a great wave of religion and revival, which is booked for the Great White Way and Wall street, and the Bowery and Fifth avenue, and even Fourteenth street, during the last week of April.

This is a good plan, because the run and rush, hurry and scurry to get spring suits and Easter ties are so absorbing for the needs of the body, mere men are forgetting to follow the mandate of oracles of Greece, when hurled down from Homer and his Odyssey; from Socrates and the other philosophers; the message—Know Thyself. Men are too busy to snatch the fleeting moments, really to know anything about the inner shrine of self, where the ideal man is enthroned—the divine self that feeds on the bread of Truth.

Therefore I say religion and revival are good, if the teachers are giving clear and hopeful messages to cheer the depressed, to strengthen the weak, and urge the strong that burdens must be shared.

Now these religious assemblies are missionary meetings. Only this week it has been my opportunity to explain to meagre minds that the word missionary means anyone who has a particular errand or message. The work of the medical missionary is valuable; the work of the educational missionary is indispensable; and the religious missionary is not any more consecrated than he, or she, who by his individual efforts at his work to inspire others of his friends, comrades and children of city to focus on right thinking and right living.

The first royal road to the attention of an assembly or congregation is to get the attention—let me type that word in capitals—ATTENTION.

There is nothing that will get the attendance so promptly at a revival as printed handbills that moving pictures will be used to assist in making the services interesting.

The manufacturers should get busy and post the exchanges with the films that are in stock, that will convince bishops, priests, deacons, elders and wardens that moving pictures will bring out folks of a family when simply other methods of dearly beloved brethren entirely fail.

The Suffragan Bishop of this Episcopal Diocese is one of the broadest, bravest inspiring men in orders. Bishop Burch was one of the most successful newspaper publishers of the Middle West—Grand Rapids, Mich. He is particularly celebrated for his interest in the needs of the working classes, and, like my blessed friend and adviser, Bishop Potter, is one of the most accessible men to the people desiring a hearing.

If the leading men of the moving picture industry would have an interview with Bishop Burch and present the splendid evolution of this art, which was born on a racecourse, therefore logically bound to go forward with speed; if the co-operation of such men as Bishop Burch, Rev. Dr. James Wasson, formerly of the Tribune and identified with the city mission work of Manhattan; Rev. Mr. Eaton, of Madison Avenue Baptist Church, whose feature work is among the young; Rev. Dr. Edmund Wasson, of the Crown, Newark, N. J.—a man up to date in teaching the spirit of a practical religion to establish the Fatherhood of God and Brotherhood of Man—I say if an earnest committee would present the possibilities of moving pictures to supplement the sermons, I know that adverse rulings could be averted.

But the old saying never fails: Everybody's business is nobody's business, and where are you at?

Just at a psychological crisis where a knock from the city and clergy of New York will frighten the country dominies. Really very valuable teaching will be cast into impossibilities, simply from the inertness of a committee walking in together and presenting themselves as a moving picture of appeal for an intelligent presentation of what machines can do to help men take stock in their own souls.

* * * *

Please, comrades, do not condemn this as hot air. Condemnation comes too often from ignorance. It is only right that Bishop Greer, Dr. Parkhurst, Mayor Gaynor and the religious powers that be get knowledge from the mouths of the fathers of the moving picture trade.

I believe that "luck" is only another word for "pluck." When people have the conviction of the success of their work, then they are not afraid to bring it to the front in the very face of the enemy.

* * * *

I wonder if any of you picture people are in touch with the great big people's paper—Local Unit?

This matter of "vittles and bittle," as our darkey cookladies down South call food—has really grown so threatening that something has to be done to keep "de kittle bilin'."

The Local Unit is twenty-eight pages of printed matter. The editor, Mr. Underhill, becomes a volcano in active eruption, as he talks about the need of co-operation of merchants and consumers. We literary people and middle men are actually getting ground to a pulp. Because union capital is the millstone on top, while union labor is organized quite as strongly below and will strike—down to the baby workers at factory towns—until they get what they want.

Now, then, what about the agents, professional workers, clerks, authors, reporters and those who are not so-called parasites at all? Their pay is not getting more, but disbursements from the family pocket-book going out with leaps and bounds.

Civic justice demands that somebody has to step out and see that we mothers and wives should get justice, while the gentlemen at Albany hem and haw whether any of us have a right to three meals a day—square or round; or whether we should be stuffed with sawdust and chaff, because as things are we are put in jail for smuggling even a frankfurter from Bologna; said link stuffed with only "jools." The champion of the home cause is the president of the Local Unit. Those who want to rent moving picture theatres, buy autos, eggs, tea, grits, coffee, "harmony" pianos, greens, flour, carriages, houses, lands, ploughs, oats, fish, flesh, fowl, get lingerie from a laundry and any of the million things to eat, drink, wear or tear, should get the Local Unit slip. This will save us all fifty per cent on every purchase.

Are we not tired to death of trading stamps? What pilgrimages to the grated window after hours of travel to find the place.

Every man should go and call on Local Unit—18-20 Forty-second street, East, for if fifty cents is saved from meat and drink, gloves and hats, there will be more dimes from the market baskets of mothers to spend at the moving picture theatres.

FILM FANCIES

Lonely, I sit in the soft light,
And conjure to life in the scenes
Some faces and hopes and fancies
Since long, long ago, mere dreams.

Her face shines out there before me;
I can see her again as of yore;
Her smile and her musical laughter
As she welcomes me at the door!

'Tis a face that can never grow older,
That can never part with its gleam;
'Tis a gracious possession forever,
Recalled by the picture screen.

SIDE LIGHTS ON THE CINEMATOGRAPH

The Stage and the Picture-Play——Views of Leading English Actors

By Leonard Donaldson

In England at any rate the feeling between the members of the "legitimate" stage and the photo-play is a surprisingly amicable one. One has heard so much of the opinions repeatedly put forward, that the moving picture is diverting the patronage from the play house to the picture theatre. Let, us, however, go to "The Fountain Head" for information on that matter, and I will venture to assert that the opinions of England's leading thespians will go to show that the cinematograph aids rather than hinders the original form of dramatic art.

An address was recently given at one of the biggest restaurants in the English capital, by Miss Cicely Hamilton on the question, "Is the Actor Becoming Obsolete?" Mr. Carl Hentschel, who presided, said he had approached many well-known actors and others on the points whether the actor was being superseded by the cinematograph and by the modern producer who had no use for acting, as such, and whether the picture theatres were likely to affect the actor and the drama. Mr. George Bernard Shaw replied: "No, the actor is being employed, not superseded, by the cinematographers. All the film companies now maintain their own actors and actresses, and the demand for new films keeps them busier than they would be at long-run theatres. The modern producer who has no use for acting as such—if any such person exists—will soon be superseded himself by the producer who can get the last unit of acting out of his company. A producer cannot do without acting. He must either induce his company to act, or else act all the parts himself, and bully his company into giving imitations of his performance. But, this, which is the most old-fashioned sort of producing, is necessary only when the actors cannot act, and the producer can."

Mr. Bernard Shaw made the interesting admission that he was the producer of Famy's first play, and added, "Only indirectly will the cinematograph theatre affect the actor and the drama by its effect on prices of admission, which are at present quite ridiculous. It ought, by the way, to have a directly stimulative effect on the art of pantomime, and it provides a refuge for the people who complain of my plays, because the actors talk instead of making faces at them."

Sir George Alexander then replied: "I am afraid I am not one of those who are best able to answer this question—it might become a case of suicide." Sir Herbert Tree, Mr. Arthur Bowichier and Miss Ellen Terry replied briefly in the negative. Mr. Cyril Mande said: "Certainly I consider that the cinematograph is encouraging the love of drama in a vast number of people who otherwise never had their dramatic palate tickled. I can only say I have heard that the picture theatres are going out, and that some of them are eking out a somewhat hazardous existence by engaging actors to appear in sketches."

Mr. Granville Barker and Mr. Robert Loraine both denied that the actor was being superseded by the cinematograph, Mr. Loraine saying that the counter attraction of the picture theatre would brutally eliminate tenth-rate acting, and sloppy tenth-rate shows. Mr. E. Vedrenne thought the pictures would kill much bad acting, and Mr. Zangwill pointed out that the cinematograph had the actor behind it, and an imaginative artist could make something marvelous out of it.

As I write it is announced that Sir Herbert Tree will shortly be seen supported by his own company from His Majesty's Theatre, in a series of abbreviated exhibitions of about eight of his most popular plays. Without a doubt this represents one of the most important landmarks yet made in cinematography where its relations with the stage are concerned.

Cleveland, Ohio.—A new moving picture theatre will be built on Superior Avenue.

Flushing, N. J.—Mr. Robert Whitten will erect an aerodrome on Thirteenth street, between Fifth avenue and Louisa Street.

Wichita, Kan., April 10, 1912.

Mr. Alfred H. Saunders,
Editor, Moving Picture News.

Dear Sir:

We are enclosing herewith clipping taken from one of our local papers which would be a very good article for you to publish in your valued paper.

The moving picture exhibitors of this city have for the past several months been trying to get their shows open on Sunday and have been defeated in every case by the church people, and now the same people who have been fighting them are going to open a show of their own, as you will note from the enclosed clipping; and this only goes to show that the interest of moving pictures is fast developing into wider circles with the aid of educational films. We will soon see the time when every church and public institution will be using the moving pictures as an educational feature.

We are very much pleased with your efforts regarding this line and believe you are working in a mighty good cause. We are very much in favor of the Moving Picture News and always boost it whenever possible, and lately have been instrumental in sending you a number of subscribers. We recommend the News over all other trade papers, as we believe it to be the best.

Yours very truly,
THE RITESERVICE FILM EXCHANGE,

PICTURE SHOW FOR A CHURCH

First Methodist Is Going to Lead Out—To Boost the Sunday School—"On Time" Pupils Will See the Show Free—Scholars Who are Late Will Be Made Pay the Moving Picture Show Rate of Five Cents—First Exhibition April 17

The First Methodist Episcopal Church of Wichita has decided to go into the moving picture business to increase the membership of its Sunday-school.

O. A. Boyle has been made chairman of a committee to purchase and install a fireproof booth and picture equipment. He will make a contract with a film company for a series of the best films.

The first moving picture show will be given in the church Wednesday, April 17.

They Beat the Baptists

The church board decided to install the show only after lengthy argument as to the wisdom of doing so. The First Methodist Church will be the first one in the Southwest to conduct a show of any kind. The First Baptist Church has been talking of conducting a picture show in the church.

It is believed the membership of the Methodist Sunday-school can be raised to 1,000 in less than six weeks by the show. There were 800 members of the Sunday-school present Sunday.

Members of the Sunday-school who are on time in attendance the Sunday before the first show, will be given free tickets to the show, but those who are late or absent and those who are not members will be charged the regular moving picture show rate of 5 cents.

Must Support Itself

It is planned to make the show self-supporting soon. A show will be given every Wednesday night. Later they will be given several times a week. Three films will be run at each show with twenty minutes' intermission for a social time.

The church board believes clean entertainment and fun can be used for the advancement of the church and religion in general. It has been decided that moving pictures are among the leading influences for good or bad, not only among young people but among adults. The church plans to make an influence for good by attracting young people to clean, uplifting shows.

St. Louis, Mo.—A syndicate is being formed to build a moving picture theatre on Florissant avenue, between W. Walnut Manor and Jennings Station.

LIBRARIANS IN WASHINGTON ON MOVING PICTURES

By Willard Howe

In order to ascertain what the librarians of the two chief institutions of this character in the Capital of the nation think of moving pictures, I have interviewed the assistant librarian of the District of Columbia Public Library, whose statements are confirmed by the librarian himself, Mr. George F. Bowerman. I have also had a lengthy talk with Mr. Herbert Putnam, of the Library of Congress, a man of rare talents in his particular line and who is ever ready to advance movements that tend towards the educational, informative and research development of the country.

The District of Columbia Public Library is the free or municipal library, and therefore directly associated with the people. While not fully equipped with a modern auditorium, it offers such a hall as it possesses for lectures on various subjects, and many interesting, illustrated talks have been enjoyed by the public under the patronage of this "university for the people."

In regard to the use of motion pictures in connection with the work of this library, the officials are somewhat reticent, chiefly on account of the limited knowledge as to the feasibility of such a movement. While acknowledging that the reels as placed upon the market have in many cases educational values, Librarian Bowerman is not desirous of making an experiment until he is able to ascertain what other libraries are doing in this direction, what courses have been pursued, and what benefit has been derived from the use of motion pictures in libraries. Therefore any information furnished Mr. Bowerman on this subject will be gladly welcomed.

Though this librarian admits that the institution is in no position at present to introduce motion pictures, nor would a favorable opportunity be presented for another year at least, he states that he has in mind several other means of educational advancement that he would give preference over a reel teaching. Two chief reasons that he gives for delaying the experimenting of motion pictures are the limited finances of the library and its small force.

The District of Columbia Public Library is situated in the vicinity of a number of moving picture theatres, so that those employed in this institution cannot fail to note the strong hold that this means of entertainment and information has upon the public. Librarian Bowerman is anxious to learn of the uses other librarians have made in this newest avenue of advancement in the march of progress, so that when the time comes with tested experiences of others and ample finances at hand, the municipal library of Washington will be in readiness to introduce the motion picture as an auxiliary to its educational work. As to the feasibility of such a movement, the officials do not feel in a position to speak at present in view of their present limited knowledge on the subject.

My interview with Mr. Putnam was exceedingly agreeable. I was pleased to know that the exalted position of Librarian of Congress has not made this man of broad intelligence scorn moving pictures, nor did he hesitate to admit that he had on occasions visited such exhibitions. His views on the subject can best be appreciated in the signed statement from Mr. Putnam, which is here appended. Such words from a man in his capacity mean much to the moving picture industry and should receive wide circulation.

"The possible service of the stage in both informing the public and in educating its taste is accepted and has been understood for generations. The opportunities of the moving picture shows are precisely similar in kind and even more far reaching, because of the larger number of people that they reach, at less expense, in informal ways, and in places where plays of the better class are not produced, or produced very imperfectly.

"The opportunities open to the moving picture for a real public service are extraordinary. The only question is as to how far the authorities controlling moving pictures shall take advantage of them. That they are already taking advantage of them to a notable extent seems to me obvious. For anyone passing the billboards of these moving picture theatres must be struck by the number of scenarios that deal either with historical episodes, or current events, or with undertakings like preventive measures against diseases, or in behalf of sanitation, or otherwise calculated to inform the public of what may be useful to know or interest it in what may be wholesome to do or to avoid.

"So notable is the opportunity offered by the film to create such an interest without effort and in connection with an enjoyment which assures pleasure in the reception of it and therefore a more enduring effect from it—that projects are, I know, being discussed for utilizing the pictures in connection with our public libraries. The libraries with which, however, if such projects should be adopted, they would be associated, are the popular municipal libraries, and not a research library such as the Library of Congress. They are therefore a matter as to whose expediency the municipal librarians must consider. I have not had occasion to do so.

"There is, of course, another side which every librarian concerned with the promotion of exact knowledge and the cultivation of sound taste in the public is concerned—and all librarians are—the very opportunity of these pictures to do good has its counterpart in the power to do ill. Now the ill done by a film which portrays history in an inexact way is not serious any more than it may be in a book which portrays history in an inexact way, but the film which vulgarizes the taste of an audience is doing a harm which cannot be remedied; and with other librarians, and all persons who care or have any responsibility for the betterment of the public taste, I rejoice in every indication that those who are concerned in the production and exploitation of the films are seeking in a systematic way to avoid subjects or methods of treatment that are calculated to vulgarize the taste; and increasingly to give the preference to scenarios that, even if not actually instructive in any definite way, at any rate awaken the interest, stir the imagination, intensify sympathy for what is sound in sentiment and enlarge the sense of what is beautiful in nature and in art.

HOWARD M. MITCHELL

Howard Mitchell, one of the Lubin Stock Company's players, was detailed by Director Joseph Smiley to go to the police station one night to study types for a certain picture that was being made. Mitchell thought he would enjoy the experience and accepted the job.

Presenting himself, he obtained from the assistant chief the permission to look around. A lot of poor derelicts were waiting to be assigned the numbers of their rooms for the night. The watch at the desk changed and Mitchell was still there. Presently a couple of policemen took charge of the guests and ordered them to line up. Mitchell dropped in and without any apprehension allowed himself to be pushed into a cell with another vagrant. The companion questioned the player as to what he had done; Mitchell replied nothing, to which the other added "Dat's me, too; I ain't done nuthing neither; them cops is too fresh pickin' up men like me an' you; they're looking for a record."

An hour passed and Mitchell felt that he had seen enough and would like to get back to the Continental. He called for the night watch, but there was no answer. Another hour passed, and there was no sign of release. At last he secured the attention of a good-natured policeman and stated his case. For a while there seemed to be an apathy, and there were signs of a laugh from the office. Then the actor was brought to the desk; the night clerk pretended to search the blotter, then went to the 'phone and also pretended to call up Mr. Lubin. After some serious talk Mitchell was permitted to go. It was not until next morning that he discovered that it was a put-up joke arranged by a few of the boys in the plant.

Philadelphia, Pa.—F. G. Nixon-Nirdlinger and Thomas M. Love will lease the Grand Opera House, at Broad street and Montgomery avenue, for a period of ten years.

Darly, Pa.—Robert Holt will run a moving picture show in Shee's Hall.

Seattle, Wash.—S. N. Smith has been granted a permission to construct a moving picture show in front of the Alki Point Bathing Beach.

LUCKY JIM

One of the scenes from this dashing Western reel is reproduced herewith. Champion is again putting forth Western and Indian stories, but this time they are subjects which the standard of filmdom will gladly welcome.

A RECORD BOOKING

Bertram Adler has booked the Thanhouser Kid for a ten-minute appearance every Monday night at the Colonial Theatre, Hoboken. Mr. Adler states that the engagement does not call for any stated number of appearances, but is indefinite. The News believes this is a new wrinkle in the booking of film favorites at vaudeville shows. Occasionally photoplayers showing at the theatres have been engaged for return dates, but we have never heard of an engagement in the "indefinite" class before.

THE OPERATOR

Dedicated to Aux. Local 35, I. A. T. S. E.
By Tom Costello

For months Lew had been working overtime
In a small coop, and a hard grind
With only a few hours for food and sleep.
When no sleep came, because of the dull heat
Of his fagged brain, and he could scarcely eat,
And now on Sunday, when most men are free
He cranked and cranked, incessantly.
He was so dazed he could hardly keep
His hands from going through the pantomime
Of framing the picture on his machine—
The sleek machine that day and night,
Fed with film, and strong rays of light,
Through the glaring, flaring hours.
Shut off from God's sunlight and flowers
He ran the film through the machine;
Different tints of yellow, blue and green
With sunny fields and running streams,
Ships at sea, and golden sands,
The different people in foreign lands,
Until at times the whir and click
Of the running film made him sick.
And though at first the colors made him glad
They soon were dancing in his brain like mad;
And kept on flaring through his burning head
While the carbons hissed and flamed so red.
Now blazing green and staring blue,
But he turned, and turned, and the film flew.
Then the boss cried faster, do you hear me "Lew?"
He speeded faster, the blue and green
Were blurred in one to him it seemed.
The sunny fields, the running stream,
The ships at sea the golden sands,
The different people in foreign lands,
Until the machine with a roar and glare
Fascinated him, and with a senseless stare,
The film caught and snapped: but his hand
Almost before his brain could understand,
Had pulled off the switch, the handle stopped
Just in the nick of time, and poor "Lew" dropped,
Half senseless on the hard iron floor,
And he'd lain there dazed for a minute or more.
The rewinder helped him to his seat
And soon he was upon his feet,
Running films through the machine
Of different tints of blue and green,
The sunny fields and the running stream,
The boss cried faster, but Lew did not mind,
He told the boss, no more he'd grind

As the operators say, "YEARS AHEAD OF ANY OTHER MACHINE ON THE MARKET"
